If we had contemplated a campaign in the Aegean against Turkey and with Italian naval means, we should probably have acted very much as the Italians have done, although we might have preferred a base—the Bay of Muros in Lemnos or that of Kalloni in Mytilene—better fitted for controlling the Dardanelles. The question is what the Italians will do next. We cannot suppose that action will end here, for it is puerile to ring the bell at the door of the Dardanelles and then run away. So far as it has gone the naval action in the Aegean cannot be expected to exercise any serious influence on the course of the war, and it must be noticed that the official report of the return of the Fleet at once caused violent criticism in Italy. The peninsula is in a state of exultation and is just now capable of doing anything. Italy plumes herself in the belief that she is acting in the highest moral and material interests of Europe, and even the staid Ministerial Trihuna talks of "striking the enemy to the heart" and declares that oggi l'Italia riprende la fila delle sue antiche e più gloriose tradizioni.

People who want to strike Turkey to the heart, have got their work cut out for them, because Turkey is a powerful military Empire and her Moslem soldiers are brave and warlike. The object can be attained by forcing the Dardanelles and appearing before Constantinople, or by landing an army to beat the Turks, or by combined operations on sea and land, with or without allies. These alternatives deserve a little preliminary investigation.

It is questionable whether the Italian Navy will be in any hurry to try and force the Dardanelles, and it is still more questionable whether a country so dependent for security upon its Navy, would risk the almost certain losses of such an operation. The Turkish guns may not all be up to date, their gunners may not be trained up to the high standard required in this branch of the art of war, the batteries may be exposed to sharpshoot attack, and battleships might hope to overcome the forts in turn by standing off and engaging them at ranges at which the Turkish guns would be comparatively innocuous. With a fleet to spare the thing might be done. But the Narrows are a nasty place, the line of batteries, high and low, is almost continuous, it would be difficult to sweep for mines under a close and severe fire, the Turkish ships anchored above the mine field will have to be dealt with, while contact mines linked together and let loose down a 3-knot current would be uncommonly difficult to fend off. We should certainly expect heavy losses in our attack, and we should be justified in seeking a means to avoid them.

An alternative would be to bring not less than 150,000 men to the Aegean, to land them on the northern shore of the Gallipoli Peninsula, to defeat the Turkish Army Corps now encamped there, to occupy the Bulair lines, and to attack the forts in the Strait from the rear, turning their guns against the batteries on the Asia Minor shore, and clearing the way for the Fleet. This is a pretty enough plan on paper, and the landing would be covered by the guns of the Fleet, but the 30,000 Turks of the local garrison would take some turning out, and they could be heavily reinforced. It has yet to be proved that the Italian Army is capable of conducting an operation of this magnitude without allies.

Can Italy find allies? The knowledge that 1,500,000 Italians were ready to attack the Turks and Constantinople would be a tremendous temptation to the Balkan States, all of whom covet one part of Turkey or another, even if several of them covet the same parts. This is the real danger of the situation. Every body knows that it is, and Italy is taking advantage of the fact. We may think it odious of Italy to bring the match to the powder, but belligerents have their rights and must in justice to their cause do what offers to the best chance of success. This war has always been dangerous, and things will probably be worse before they are better.

The Real Situation in Tripoli.

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade")

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF 11TH APRIL 1912.)

Our friend Abdel Kader Hamza, Chief Editor of the Al-Akaly has just interviewed Edham Pasha, the Commandant of the Turkish Forces in front of Tobruk. Edham Pasha has completed his voyage to Alexandria and will leave for Constantinople very shortly. It is on account of an ailment which became serious in Cyrenaïque that Edham Pasha, who is an old man of 60, has been obliged to quit the theatre of hostilities.

"What is the situation of the Ottoman combatants to-day?"

"The condition of the Ottoman Forces is satisfactory beyond your expectations, and what makes the situation of our troops most the fact of the Italians venturing out of their trenches only very rarely. The greater part of the arms and ammunition which our men are using has been captured from the enemy. I may mention for instance that a Bedouin named Moutmonah of the tribe of Ben Mariam killed five of his adversaries in an encounter and returned with five rifles. Such instances of the bravery of our troops speak for themselves."

"Did you experience any difficulty in getting the tribes together at the commencement of hostilities?"

"I arrived in Cyrenaïque a few days after the declaration of war and I am one of those who have brought the Bedouin tribes together. I have the greatest pleasure in telling you that the Arabs did not need to be called by us, they came to us, willingly and gladly determined to fight the aggressors."

"What was the number of Ottoman regulars in Tripolitaine at the time of the declaration of war?"

"It did not exceed ten thousand men at the most. Just now there are on the Derna Benghazi-Tobruk line 40,000 regulars on an average, of those Arabs who have undergone a military training since the commencement of hostilities and have been enrolled in the ranks of Turkish regulars. In case of emergency this number can be increased to 60,000 by calling for men from the interior. In this number I do not include the volunteers who arrive by hundreds every day."

"Has the Arab enthusiasm for the war diminished in any way after five months of the struggle?"

"I found that their enthusiasm had increased to such an extent that they wished to assume the offensive every instant and we were obliged to restrain them from exposing themselves to fruitless dangers."

"What news could you give me concerning the Senoussi?"

"All the Senoussi tribes are in accord with the Tripolitan Arabs and the Turks in defending the Khilafat and the Fatherland to the last drop of their blood."

"Have the Senoussi tribes arrived on the field of battle?"

"Many tribes have arrived in the environments of Derna and Benghazi. As for Sheikh El Senoussi El Syed Ahman El Sherif, he is at El Kufra at present. We have had negotiations with him and sent to him exactly twenty-eight days ago the camels, etc., necessary for his journey. He will probably arrive at the Camp at Derna in thirty-five days to meet Enver Bey, the Chief of all the Forces in Cyrenaïque, and to devise measures in concert with him. He will take up his residence near the Camp. He has just given orders to all the tribes depending on him to rise for the war and fight on the side of the Ottomans, threatening those refusing to do so with expulsion from his sect."

"Did you, too, supervise the military education of the Arabs?"

"The Arabs are born warriors and we do not find the slightest difficulty in initiating them into the methods of modern warfare. We find in them inborn intelligence and disposition which make one think that they have just come from a military school. Most of them seek the officers of their own accord to learn from them the secrets of the handling of the arms and of the service in the field."

"What was the situation when you arrived at Derna?"

"The situation was not particularly bright. The Italians had occupied Derna, Benghazi and Tobruk, the governors of these places had left for the interior and the tribes occupied entrenched positions on the mountains. Then Enver Bey arrived at Derna and met me. We embraced and without losing a moment conferred, though there were not with us more than eight persons altogether. We decided that Enver Bey should remain at Derna and I go to Tobruk. Either of us raised a standard and entered the hinterland to visit the tribes and call them to the war. To our call they responded and in a brief space of time we succeeded in bringing together our forces which had stopped and still stop the advance of the Italians. Amongst the Chiefs who displayed the greatest enthusiasm was Sheikh El Mabni, Chief of the Ben Mariam tribe, who has just met with his death on the field of honour."

"How do the Arabs get on with Enver Bey?"

"The Arabs love him from the bottom of their hearts because he treats them with the greatest consideration and also because they know that he is related to the Sultan's family. To attach the Arab still more to him he has entered the Senoussi sect itself and has become one of the religious lieutenants of the Great Sheikh. On his arrival at Derna Enver Bey did not know a word of Arabic, while to-day he speaks it very fluently."

"Have the Arabs had any news of the peace negotiations and what are their sentiments in this connection?"

"The Chiefs of the tribes came to me one night in great haste and woke me up. They were very displeased and one could see on their countenances signs of intense anxiety. I asked them what had agitated them so much and they answered that they had just heard that an armistice had been declared. I assured them that the news was untrue and the signs of their anxiety immediately disappeared. They told me that they would never like to hear of an armistice or of any other thing, they wanted to fight to the last man, the last infant and the last woman. When there is no one living in the country, Italy can take Tripolitaine 'but,' said they, 'God will not permit this.' This is the sentiment of all the Arabs without any exception."

"Can the Arabs continue the struggle for a long time?"

"I do not doubt that they could carry on the war as long as they need to—for one or two years or even more."

"Have the Italian aeroplanes caused any damage in the Ottoman camp?"

"The aeroplanes come to us very often, but with insignificant result. One day an aeroplane spoiled my tent on account of the flags near it and dropped a bomb which fell at 30 or 40 metres distance and buried itself in the sand without exploding."

"What is the state of general security of the country in these troubled times?"

"The Arabs are very sincere in their ideas about this war and this sincerity has produced a sentiment of solidarity, so that there is no need of police or of soldiers to ensure the tranquillity of the country. Of this I must give you an instance. A caravan unescorted by soldiers and carrying 20,000 pounds in gold succeeded in reaching Derna from Sollum without in the least being molested on the way."

"What effect has the war had on the agriculture of the country?"

"By God's grace the harvest this year has been very much better than that of the past years. We have divided the population into two parts, one part is occupied in the war, and the other attends to the work in the fields. We have established a sort of rotation of services, which gives us refreshed soldiers for fighting purposes and allows those who have been campaigning to return to their fields and live the life of agriculturists. We have made the women understand that they should occupy themselves with agriculture and now they help the men. All things considered, the war one can say, has had no direct effect on agriculture."

"What news could you give us about the Egyptian Commander, Aziz Bey?"

"He is one of our good officers, and is just now Commandant of troops at Benghazi. He has exhibited splendid bravery in all the interesting battles that have taken place recently."

"It appears that in the recent encounter you have captured much ammunition?"

"The ammunition we captured was sold in a public market which remained open for ten days."

"Have the Crescent Missions done their work satisfactorily?"

"Oh, yes, and allow me here to express my gratefulness to the Egyptians for their humanitarian action. They have rendered the most remarkable service to their brothers who are fighting in the Tripolitaine and are most grateful for it."

"Why did you leave Tobruk, General?"

"I suffered from rheumatism from before the declaration of war. Since then I have paid no attention to my ailment and have traversed Tripolitaine from one end to the other because I had the conviction that the Fatherland needed my services. I have passed the time in spite of my sufferings in participating in the war on the one hand and on the other in organising the Arabs and obtaining ammunition for them. Thank God I have accomplished my wishes. When I found that the situation could give me some respite for recuperation, I selected Kınakam Mohamed Nazim Bey to fill my place. He is one of the best and bravest officers of my camp and I have absolute confidence in him."

Mahmud Shevket Pasha on the War.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, April 14.

It was in the lofty, spacious rooms of the Seraskerat (War Office) on the third hill of Old Stamboul, where I was received in a most courteous manner by the War Minister Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, whose words I have briefly telegraphed to you. Of all the statesmen of modern Turkey he is the most remarkable figure. It is not too much to say that without him there would have been no Ottoman revolution, no Constitution, no development on liberal lines of progress. The whole Ottoman nation looks up to him as their beloved hero, leader and saviour from oppression and ruin.

"I am but a humble, faithful soldier of my fatherland (said Shevket Pasha), ready to serve it to my last breath, but if my Government had dealt with another country in so dastardly a way as Italy has dealt with us, I would flee my land in shame and horror. There is no peace in sight, and each day, each additional hour of the agony of conflict will be recorded by history as an ineffaceable stain upon the national conscience of Italy."

"The more so as we are perfectly willing to grant to her any concession, any demand that is in keeping with our dignity as an awakening Power, and with the prerogatives of our beloved Padishah and Khalif. We are perfectly prepared, for instance, to leave to Italy the entire commercial and financial development of both Tripoli and Cyrenaica. This would be of enormous advantage to Italy. Instead of spending her millions on war, she could utilise them to make any improvement on the lines of development which she deemed best. We could make in this direction any amount of reasonable grants. But unfortunately for the world, Italy is completely blinded as to her own true interests and sticks to the word 'annexation' with that fatal fanaticism which has often proved the ruin of a nation."

"What does Italy seek in Tripoli? It is a dry barren Arab country, absolutely useless to her. It will be a perpetual source of trouble and vexation to her. At the end it will prove her ruin. But I say she is blinded and there is no genius, it seems, to enlighten her."

"You will admit that we cannot give up the sovereign rights of our Sultan over a great part of our Empire, which is essentially Moslem. It would be different with, for instance, Albania or Macedonia, or Crete, with their heterogeneous, international population, although we are ready to defend these, too, with our last drop of blood. The more so shall we fight for Tripoli. It is almost exclusively Arab. And I am an Arab. Shame on Italy, on anybody suggesting that we should acquiesce in Italy's annexation of Tripoli."

"The extension of hostilities is quite likely to occur. Italy has given evidence of her spasmodic mode of action. She might again make some dastardly and desperate move. We expect it and are prepared to meet every eventuality. Personally I am rather eager to know what she is going to do now. It interests me enormously from a strategical and technical point of view. The world will yet have some lessons in warfare. Perhaps it is the sentiment of a soldier that speaks in me."

"The forcing of the Dardanelles? I am really interested to know how that could be done. It will open up an altogether new situation and the lesson will be extremely instructive. Do you not see? It will not be fleet against fleet, but sea against land, fleet against fortress, dreadnought against mine. Singularly interesting, indeed, to watch the result!"

There was an air of irony in the last words of the War Minister. He continued—

"The 36 miles of the Dardanelles are exceedingly well provided with hundreds of submarine mines of every variety and description. I have inspected the fortifications myself, and I find everything in perfect order. Let the Italians come!"

"The meeting of the Chamber of Deputies will in no way affect the course of the War. All the representatives of our nation are unanimously for the continuation of hostilities as long as there is no willingness on the part of Italy to discuss terms of peace on the basis of the Sultan's sovereignty—complete and unconditional sovereignty—in Tripoli and Cyrenaica."

As I left the War Minister I met, on the plateau of the Seraskerat, a whole regiment of soldiers performing their daily exercises under well trained officers. One could not help admiring their admirable bearing, their strong, steady arms, their tall, sturdy figures, and I remembered Mahmoud Shevket Pasha's ironical words: "Let the Italians come! Let them meet us in an honest battle!"

Kiamil Pasha on the War.

MR. M. H. DONOHUE writes to the Daily Chronicle from Constantinople, on April 11th.—

His Highness received me at his kiosk, on the outskirts of Stamboul. The house is surrounded by a large garden. It is an oasis in a desert of desolation, since it happens to be one of the few houses in this part of Stamboul which the recent fire left undestroyed. Kiamil Pasha had just returned from Egypt, where he had passed the entire winter. On his way to and from the Durbar, their Majesties received him on board the Royal yacht when it touched at Port Said.

Despite his advanced years, I found His Highness to be the possessor of a remarkable degree of mental and physical vigour. There are political prophets in Stamboul who believe that Kiamil will for a second time be called upon to fill a very high office of state.

The Italian ambassador, after inviting me to sit beside him on the divan, expressed his deep appreciation of the signal honour conferred upon him by the King and Queen. "I had a long talk with the King," said he, "and as an old man and one who has seen a great deal, I think your King is a very able man, possessing an extraordinary grasp of international affairs and a keen, critical judgment of men and things." Kiamal Pasha's thoughts next turned to the war.

"I will tell you what I think of it," he declared emphatically. "It is a misfortune for Turkey, but it is a much greater misfortune for Italy." While his Highness it transpired, does not always see eye to eye with the Committee of Union and Progress, he did this body the credit of saying that in refusing to discuss the Italian peace conditions, the members of the committee, who, of course, stand for the Government, had deserved well of their country.

"The war," he continued, "as far as I can judge, is likely to continue indefinitely unless Italy recovers her reason, which she appears to have lost temporarily. The struggle is, financially speaking, costing Turkey little, but it is becoming ruinous to Italy and in the end she is much more likely to sue for peace than we are." "Of course," he continued, "it would be different if the were to attempt to carry the war into European Turkey. Then she would speedily learn that we had an Army at our backs, the struggle would soon be decided if we were to meet on land, and unless I am grossly over-estimating the efficiency, organisation and courage of the Turkish Army, Turkey would be able to impose her will upon Italy."

The decree of annexation, His Highness asserted, was well worthy of the nation which had produced so much excellent comic opera, and of so diverting a kind. "Why did not the Italian Government," he said, "when about it, annex Constantinople too. It would have been equally logical. In my opinion it will take Italy at least 20 years to make any impression upon the hinterland of Tripoli. In the meantime much may happen. No Turkish Government could possibly ask our Parliament to vote away a Turkish province. The members of the Cabinet that proposed such a measure of national humiliation would be lynched by the justly indignant people. Even were we to vote away Tripoli to-morrow, we could not, by a simple Act of Parliament, compel the Arabs to cease hostilities."

"We hear a great deal about the friendly intervention of certain of the Powers, but Italian statesmen must surely realise the impossibility of any combination of nations coercing Turkey into the accepting of peace which she does not seek and which contains conditions humiliating to her as a nation. If the Italians believe we are incapable of offensive action and that Turkey is at their mercy, why do they not come to Constantinople and present their peace proposals here?"

"There is another thing," added His Highness in conclusion, "which Italy has apparently overlooked, it is this: with us the cession of Tripoli is a question involving something much greater than the mere loss of the territory involved. It would mean the end of the spiritual rule of the Pashah the recognised head of Islamism. The Arabs would rightly enough tax the Sultans with treason in delivering them into the hands of a foreign Power. Our prestige in the eyes of the whole Moslem world would be lost, it would probably mean the restoration of the Arab Khalifate, the disruption of the Turkish Empire—in short, the beginning of the end. Therefore, and even with the sword at our throat, we will never yield. The sooner Italy realises this and approaches us in a more reasonable and more conciliatory spirit, the sooner will peace reign again in Europe."

The War in Tripoli: an Ultimate Solution.

(By EX-DIPLOMATICUS.)

THE Italian nation continues to be a cause of mirth to Europe, of mirth mingled with contempt, and rising anger, too, especially in France, where the spectacle of a huge European army playing the coward in North Africa and afraid to face a handful of Turks and Arabs in open field excites disgust and apprehension. It is beginning to be felt that the Italian somnolence at Tripoli, where all the paraphernalia of modern warfare is boastfully paraded, but the essential element of success, physical courage, is so conspicuously absent, has compromised the dignity of Christendom and is lowering Western prestige. Italy is making all the European nations ridiculous, and neither French nor English imperialism can pretend to be pleased at it. Hence the absurd explanations we see in our London jingo Press as the Italian situation at Ain Zara and in the Cyrenaica, where every reason is suggested for the military failure except the true one, namely, that the Italian conscript is a mere poltroon and cannot be got to risk his skin where bullets are flying or an armed enemy may be anywhere in sight. As a fighting race, the Southern Italian of to-day seems to stand on a lower level even than the modern Hellenes. The Greek army, when it made war on Turkey ten years ago, advanced into Thessaly and fought a battle or two in the open before it ran away, the Italian army refuses to advance at all outside the protection of its ships or to strike an open blow except at women.

Diplomatically, too, the Italian fiasco has been complete. Its latest manoeuvre has been the agreement come to with the Russian Government to make a joint naval attack on Constantinople, the one by the Dardanelles, the other by the Bosphorus, but this has been rudely forbidden by the Central European Powers, which have no notion of allowing any further advance by Russia in the direction of European Turkey, and we now see Italian statesmanship reduced to the expedient of threatening this and that seaport with their fleet in the Levant, while all the world knows it to be mere stage thunder, on the oft chance of frightening the Porte into granting terms of peace. There is not, however, the smallest chance either of intimidating the Ottoman Government or, we believe, of any serious attempt being made by the Italian fleet in the direction of Constantinople, now that the hope of Russian co-operation has had to be abandoned. I understand that when Kaiser Wilhelm met King Victor at Venice the other day he pointed out, knowing something of naval matters, how great would be the risk of an attempt to force a passage through the Dardanelles, and explained to his younger ally that the Italian fleet could not effect its purpose without such serious damage to the ships as to leave many of them crippled and all of them in need of repairs which they would find it impossible to make good, how at best the fleet inside the Sea of Marmora would soon be rendered helpless through lack of a local coal supply, and that it would be then obliged either to force its passage back to the Mediterranean, or in a short time to find itself immobilised and starved into surrender. The first condition of success against Constantinople would have to be the landing of an Army in European Turkey, where it would be at once confronted with a vastly superior Ottoman force to that in Tripoli, and once more stalemated. The Italian people may be empty headed enough to insist on such a coup being attempted, but it is inconceivable that the Government should entertain it, and still more so that it should succeed. The upshot of the affair will probably be that the Italian Government, after having spent a hundred or so more millions, will, before the end of the year, make up its mind to cut its loss, as Russia did in Manchuria eight years ago, and retire from North Africa with a flourish and a grimace, declaring, like the fox in the fable, that the grapes were sour and the game was not worth the candle.

Tripoli's ultimate fate it is difficult to conjecture. We know that there has been an intrigue between the British Government and certain personages at Constantinople to obtain for the Khedivate a reversion of the Cyrenaica. It is thought that such a solution would save the Sultan's dignity by leaving to him the overlordship of that district on the same terms as Egypt is held. The idea was part, I understand, of the intrigue conducted during the past winter through the ex-Vizier Kiamil Pasha, and it will probably be renewed when Italy finds she has had enough of her North African adventure. France would then perhaps, claim Tripoli town and its hinterland as an addition to her protectorate of Tunis, and it is likely that the possibility of such a new entente has already been talked over at Paris. But this is not the same as the thing being done, and the Central Powers may well raise objection. Of course, . . . we could look forward to the evacuation of Egypt as still part of our Foreign Office programme, the addition of the Cyrenaica to the Khedive's Dominions would be a solution of the question, not the worst of the many that might be proposed. It might well be regarded by the Porte as a possible passer aller. England's honour, however, is at present a hydra at Constantinople, and it will need much plainer assurance of good faith than can be expected of Sir Edward Grey to cause a patriotic Government to accept it even in that light. It is difficult not to foresee that a new conference of the Powers, signatories of the Treaty of Paris, will be needed for the final settlement of North-Eastern Africa, and that this, when it is summoned, will necessarily include Egypt as well as Tripoli in its purview. The thing looks far enough away to-day, but may not be found so a year or two years hence.

What is altogether satisfactory is that the intrigue, mainly directed by our Embassy at Constantinople, against the Committee of Union and Progress in connection with the Ottoman Parliamentary Election has completely failed, and with it the hope of disuniting the various sections of the Sultan's Muhammadan Empire. It is certain now that the Committee will be supported by a largely increased majority in the new Parliament, and that thus the necessary direction of affairs will remain in the hands of the only party capable of guiding the Empire in these troubled times without transgression of its constitutional liberties. What seems to be insufficiently understood in England is that as long as the war lasts the first duty of Ottoman patriotism is not to the Constitutional régime, however sacred that may be held, but to the protection of the Empire from foreign invasion.—Egypt.

طلم هوش ربا

طلم هوش ربا ایک مشہور کتاب ہے جس میں عجیب و غریب انسانے مذکور ہیں۔ ایک زمانہ میں اس کتاب کا بہت چرچا تھا۔ ناظرین ان انسانوں کو پڑھ کر مسحور ہو جاتے تھے اور بے ساختہ اس کے مصنف کو داد دیتے تھے کہ وہ کیا باتیں دعاغ سے نکالی ہیں! مگر یہ تو فقط انسانے ہی تھے اب اصلی چیز ملاحظہ کیجئے۔ زونوفون رکارڈ پر سمٹے ہوئے ۲۵ گالوں کے ۶ چھ کالے چمپے ہیں اور چھوٹے کالے حسب معمول صرف ۵۰ روپے میں لکڑی میں۔

ایک زونوفون رکارڈ پر مشہور گویوں کے مقبول کالے اور ۶ چھ کالے اور قیمت صرف ۵۰ روپے۔ ہمارے قدر دان بیچنے کے ساتھ ان طلسمی رکارڈوں کے منتظر تھے اور ہمارے ایجنٹ تقاضے پر کٹافا کر رہے تھے۔ اب آپ کی ضمانت طبع کے واسطے یہ حاضر ہیں۔ ان گالوں کی بھد مالک نے اسلئے فوراً خرید فرمائے۔

اس صیغے کے اردو رکارڈوں کی فہرست فہمیدہ گارہ گریں گالوں سے لہا لب ہے۔ کون نہیں جانتا کہ محبتی جان۔ محمد حسین۔ جابکی ہائی۔ اچے اچے الہاز میں مقبول خاص دعاغ ہیں۔ مگر قاری عبدالباقی صاحب ایک مقدس بزرگ ہیں جنہوں نے بڑے ذوق و عرق کی کیفیت میں حضرت غوث الاعظم عبد القادر گیلانی علیہ الرحمہ کی شان میں ۲۵ در غزلیں لائیں ہیں۔ ان کے سلمے سے قلب پر ہوا اثر پڑتا ہے۔ ہمارے کی گندھارلوں کے کالے تو ایسے پسند ہوئے ہیں کہ ان کی تعریف لکھنے کی ضرورت ہی نہیں۔ طلسمی رکارڈ کو ضرور سننے کے لئے آپ کو حضرت می رہیگی۔

المہتمم

دی گریوٹون کمپنی لمیٹڈ

پوسٹ بکس نمبر ۴۸ کلکتہ

WANTED

An Indian Christian Lady, fully conversant with Hotel management. Must be at least 40 years of age. Pay Rs 30-5-50, by annual increments of rupees five. Apply with copies of testimonials (which will not be returned) to—

X, c/o The Manager,

"THE COMRADE,"

18.5.12 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta.

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh, B.A., B.L.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,

"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta.

The All-India Tea & Trading Co., Limited.

Head Office:—SYLHET.

Capital:—Rs. 10,00,000 (Ten Lakhs).
Divided into 40,000 shares of Rs. 25, payable in five annual instalments.

A large area 5,300 acres, suitable for tea has already been secured, and the work of reclamation commenced from November 1911.

Board of Directors:—Hon'ble D. C. Deb Bahadur, Senior Government Pleader; Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid, B.L., Zemindar and Tea proprietor; Babus N. K. Roy, Dastidar, Zemindar; S. M. Chaudhury, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; H. N. Sarma, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert; M. C. Datta, pleader; N. N. Datta, B.L., pleader; P. C. Datta, B.L., pleader; D. N. Datta, Manager, Kalinagar Tea Estate; H. C. Singha, pleader; J. Tushnet, Merchant and Tea proprietor; Dr. H. K. Nandy, L.M.S., and proprietor, Baikunathapur Agricultural Farm.

Managing Director:—Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid.

Secretary:—Habu H. C. Sinha.

Organisers:—Babus S. C. Sinha, late Editor, Weekly Chronicle; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert.

Bankers:—The Sylhet Loan Co., Ltd. Already a considerable number of shares has been taken up.

Reliable and respectable Agents for sale of shares are wanted in all parts of India and Burma.

For Forms and Prospectuses, etc., apply to—

H. C. SINHA,

8-6-12.

Secretary.

The Regular Homoeopathic College,

115 A, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta.

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopath, Dr. R. C. Nag, M.D., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica," Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, for teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years. (H) L. M., S. & (H) M.B. titles. Most regular lectures. The Staff most experienced and efficient and includes Drs. Younan and I. M. Mullick. Best lectures in "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class Dissection arranged. Evening Classes. A few free Studentships for deserving Mohammedan students. Rooms fitted with electric lights and fans. New Sessions opens on the 3rd July. Apply to the SUPERINTENDENT at 49, Cornhill Street Calcutta.

WANTED

CANVASSERS

Apply for terms to:—MANAGER,

"The Comrade,"

109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN TYPOGRAPHICAL DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

In Aid of The Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

No. { 9-12524.

{ 9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of The Gramophone Company, Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A.:—"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth."

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Houtsma, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopaedia of Islam:—"Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstol:—"The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews:—"Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the 'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and Rs. 4-8 or 6s. for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,

REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Calcutta, Punjab.

5-10-12

Haroon O. Essa Ali

☞ Pioneer of Silk Trade in Bombay. The Foremost and Most up-to-date Silk Emporium. Silk Cloth of every description and of the Finest quality supplied for any purpose.

☞ Embroidery most artistically designed and prepared under our personal supervision.

☞ We have a large Dyeing Establishment and undertake to dye in any Shade

☞ Silk Cloth of any kind to the entire satisfaction of our customers

☞ Quality and Excellence of Material guaranteed. . . . Trial Orders Solicited.

Terms Cash or V.P.P.

ہارون — ار — عیسیٰ علی
 باہر کوٹ — جاملی محلہ — درکان نمبر ۷۸-۸۰
 تیلیفون نمبر ۱۱۰۵
 نمبر ۹ بمبئی

HAROON O. ESSA ALI, Silk Merchant,

Baharkot, Jamli Mohalla, Shop No. 78-80.

TELEPHONE No. 1105.

No. 9, BOMBAY.

سمن بغرض انفصال مقدمہ

حسب آرڈر ۵ قاعدہ ۵ ضابطہ دیوانی

نمبر مقدمہ ۷۸

عدالت غنیخ اعجاز رسول خالصاحب بہادر انجیری منصف مقام جہانگیر آباد ضلع بارہ بنکی —
 مدعی گنیش سنگھ ولد گوہتار سنگھ قوم ٹہاکر ساکن موضع للواری پرگنہ راجندر تحصیل فتحپور ضلع بارہ بنکی —
 بنام مدعا علیہ ۱ — ٹیکٹی ولد ناٹھون قوم امیر پٹنہ کاغٹ داری ساکن موضع چھترپال مزرعہ
 دولی پور پرگنہ تحصیل نوابنگ —

بنام مدعا علیہ ۲ — منوال ولد مہالی قوم دولاتی پٹنہ نوکری ساکن نوابنگ محلہ گولریا گاردہ —
 بنام ٹیکٹی و منوال ساکن چھترپال مزرعہ دولی پور و نوابنگ محلہ گولریا گاردہ ضلع بارہ بنکی —
 واضح ہو کہ مدعی نے تمہارے نام ایک نالش باہف ۶-۴-۳۴ کے دائر کی ہے لہذا تم کو حکم ہوتا ہے کہ تم
 بتاریخ ۴ جولائی ۱۰ بجے ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ء قبل دوپہر گھنٹہ پرا سالقا یا معرفت رکیل عدالت مجاز حسب
 ضابطہ کے جو مقدمہ کے حال سے قرار واقعی واقف کیا گیا ہو اور جو کل امور اہم متعلقہ مقدمہ کا جواب
 دے سکے یا جسکے ساتھ کوئی اور شخص ہو کہ جواب ایسے سوالات کا دے سکے حاضر ہو اور جواب دہی
 دعویٰ مدعی مذکور کی کرو اور ہر گاہ وہی تاریخ جو تمہارے احضار کے لئے مقرر ہے واسطے انفصال قطعی
 مقدمہ کے تجویز ہوئی ہے پس تم کو لازم ہے کہ اسی روز اپنے جملہ گواہوں کو حاضر کرو اور تم کو اطلاع
 دی جاتی ہے کہ اگر بروز مذکور تم حاضر نہ ہو گے تو مقدمہ بہ غیر حاضری تمہارے مسموع اور فیصل ہوگا
 اور تم کو چاہیئے کہ اپنے ساتھ ثبوت دستاویز کو جسکا معاینہ مدعی چاہتا ہے اور دوسری دستاویز کو جسکو
 تم واسطے استدلال اپنے جواب دہی کے ضروری سمجھتے ہو اپنے ساتھ لار یا معرفت رکیل کے بیچ دو —

(مہر عدالت)

DO YOU WANT TO EARN RS. 3 A DAY— ?

Making Hosiery on Durbar Auto-knitters, work easy and interesting and finished in spare time. No Experience necessary. Distance immaterial. Reliable persons kept well employed with regular work by Hosiery Manufacturers.

WE SHOW YOU HOW

to work the machine—to make the Hosiery. You then supply us with your work done at Home, for which we pay you specified wages.

CAN YOU FIND A BETTER PROPOSITION ?

What Others Say.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for Prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,
Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—MORRIS.

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 21. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, May 25, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1.

CONTENTS

	PAGE.		PAGE
THE WEEK	461	Morocco
TETE A TETE—		News of the Week	471
Fugitive Pilgrims of Assurance	463	News by the English Mail	471
"Handard" Debentures	463	THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
Egypt and India	463	News of the Week	473
The Panjab Land Alienation	464	News by the English Mail	471
Act	464	International Situation	474
The Chinese Loan	464	The Dardanelles	475
LEADING ARTICLES—		Undisputed Turk	477
The European Diplomacy and	465	Arab Girls on the Battlefield	477
the War		The Problems of Turkey	478
Provincial Finance		The Italian Plan of Operations	478
TURKISH RELIEF FUND	467	From Balance of Power to
ANECDOTES	467, 482	Concert	478
THE PERSIAN CRISIS—		Italy's Difficulties	479
News of the Week	468	Why Italy Wants Tripoli	480
News by the English Mail	468	The Turkish Parties	481
The Proposed Indo-Persian		Openings in Turkey	481
Railway	469	Turkish Railways	481
The Proposed Railway to India	470	TURKISH RELIEF FUND CONT.
The New Persian Literature	471	LECTIONS IN INDIA	482
Persian M.P. in London	472	ADVERTISEMENTS	482-484

dence and the severity of the sentence, there was ground for a petition for mitigation. He understood that a petition would be presented. He hoped that the House would reserve discussion until the papers had been laid on the table of the House.

Britain and Germany

During a debate in the Reichstag on Germany's foreign policy references were made chiefly to England. Socialists declared that an understanding depended upon Germany alone, as England had repeatedly pronounced in favour of an entente. Conservatives and the centre, however, denied that Germany was responsible for England continuing to arm. They said that if England withdrew her claim regarding seizure at sea there would be no reason to increase the navy. Herr Von Kiderlen-Waechter said, it was erroneous to think that Germany was opposed to abolition of the right of seizure at sea. The English were always upheld as an example, but they rigorously insisted upon demands which fitted in with their policy.

Mr Lucien Wolf, writing in the Daily Graphic, says that Baron Marshall Von Bieberstein's first task as Ambassador in London will be to place his signature to a revised version of the secret Anglo-German treaty of 1898 relating to the Portuguese Colonies. The treaty will then be published. Portuguese sovereignty and susceptibilities will be scrupulously respected but the treaty will emphasise Anglo-German interests regarding the tranquillity and progress of the Colonies outside British and German jurisdiction, south of the tenth parallel.

The Daily Express says that the Admiralty intends to meet the German naval programme by accelerating the current year's battleship construction by at least six months.

The German Colony in London gave a banquet in honour of Count Metternich, the retiring German Ambassador. In the course of a speech, Count Metternich said, "I gladly quit my position after years of work. It has not always been easy, sometimes it has been harassing. I retire the more willingly because I hand to my successor an easier task. The moment is auspicious, unless all signs are deceptive. An impulse towards reconciliation and peaceful neighbourliness is passing through two great peoples the English and the German. Here is a fruitful field for statesmanship. It was my task to prepare it, I hope it will be vouchsafed to my successor to see the ripening of the fruits."

Welsh Disestablishment.

Conservatives are jubilant at the reduction of the Government's majority to 81 in the division on the second reading of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill. Eighteen Ministerialists were absent unpaired while 75 Irish members voted with the Government.

Several well-known Non-conformist Liberals intimated to the Whips after the division that though they had voted for Disestablishment they were opposed to the disendowment clauses and they intended to form a group which would take action at the Committee stage.

In the course of the debate on the second reading of the Welsh Disestablishment Bill, Mr. Lloyd George made a notable speech in reply to an attack of Lord Hugh Cecil. The Chancellor

The Week.

Anglo-Russian Relations.

There is increasing agitation in Radical quarters in England against the sentence of four years penal servitude passed on the Englishwoman named Miss Malerka at Warsaw for consorting with revolutionaries. It is thought by some that the agitation will have a bearing on Anglo-Russian relations, which, according to the well-informed St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, have been already affected by the Persian imbroglio, Russia being disposed to support Salar-ed-Dowleh if he wins the throne, while England is diametrically opposed to such a course. Also by Russia's attitude towards the Turco-Italian war, Russia being supposedly desirous of mediating in favour of Italy, while France and England advocated absolute impartiality. Meanwhile, reports of Russian mobilization in the Caucasus are renewed. Some surmise that Russia is striving after a rapprochement with Germany and that recent Italian action was designed with Russia's assent to draw in other powers. The attitude of Germany and Austria towards the situation are naturally also the subject of much conjecture.

At question time in the House of Commons on the 22nd instant Sir Edward Grey said he would publish a full report of the Malerka trial. Meanwhile he could only say that the report went to show that taking into account the character of the evi-said that disestablishment, without disendowment, was ridiculous. The property, bequeathed for the poor and sick and education had been annexed mostly by great families, one of the most discreditable records in the history of the country. He said he was bound to notice one specially offensive case.

The Duke of Devonshire, he went on, in a circular had applied for subscriptions to oppose this Bill, charging us with the robbery of God. Yet he knows that the foundations of his fortune are laid deep in sacrilege and built on desecrated shrines and pillaged altars. (Ministerial cheers and Unionist shouts of "Limehouse.")

Then followed a heated passage of arms between the Chancellor and Lord Hugh Cecil.

Mr. Lloyd George resumed: "The charge of theft against the nation should not be brought by those whose ancestors robbed the Church, robbed the monasteries, the altars, the almshouses, the poor, and the dead. Then they come here when we are trying to recover part of the pillaged property for the poor for whom it was originally given, and venture with their hands dripping with the fat of sacrilege to accuse us of the robbery of God."

Mr. Bonar Law replied and contrasted the lukewarmness of the speeches the English members of the Cabinet with those of the Welsh, referring especially to that of Mr. Lloyd George, whose attack on the Duke of Devonshire, he declared, was the most extraordinary thing ever heard in the House. Mr. Lloyd George had done something like it on the platform and now for the first time had given a sample on the floor of the House. Could anything be more unfair than to attack a man for what his ancestors did four centuries ago? It was beneath the level of the House.

In the course of the Welsh Disestablishment debate, the Government indicated their willingness to reconsider the details of disendowment during the Committee Stage.

Indian Railways.

In the course of his paper before the Society of Arts, Mr. Neville Priestly, Secretary of the Railway Board, said that owing to the contraction of the annual capital provided and the pressing needs of the existing lines, new construction was practically at a standstill, whereas a thousand miles yearly would not be too generous a programme. The conditions governing the provision of non-guaranteed funds had failed to attract the investing public. Whether the branch line terms of 1910 would be sufficiently attractive remains to be proved. They were undoubtedly conceived in a more practical and generous spirit than the previous rules, but if we continued to insist on such high standards of construction, they would also fail. The State itself was not justified in spending large sums on high standards, since the country could be served by cheaper lines. Capital would be forthcoming, if a businesslike proposition were treated in a businesslike way.

Sir Edgar Speyer, who presided, thought that the case of unduly substantial initial construction had been made out. He pointed out that in America, lines built lightly were being subsequently strengthened out of surplus revenues, otherwise the construction would have been much smaller. Regarding finance, he said the Government of India had been handicapped by the widening of authorised trustee stock and other general causes. He suggested that capital might be attracted if one of the successful lines were taken over entirely by a private company, which would probably be more elastic and more efficient in management than State concerns. If the results were satisfactory, branch and feeder lines would be provided and other companies would be encouraged to come along and build other lines. He confessed that Mr. Priestly's paper inclined him to give closer attention to Indian Railways than hitherto.

Mr. G. W. R. Forest, Sir J. D. Rees, Sir W. Lee Warner, Sir A. Arundel, Sir James Wilson and Sir M. M. Bhowmaggree also spoke.

Mesopotamia.

Messrs. JOHN JACKSON AND COMPANY have obtained a provisional contract for four millions sterling to complete another stage of Sir William Willcock's irrigation scheme in Mesopotamia, which will involve a total outlay of 30 millions sterling.

China.

The conference of the Chinese loan bankers in London has concluded for the present. It will be resumed at a later date, which has not yet been fixed. Some of the delegates are leaving England to confer with their principals.

Reuter learns that considerable progress has been made. The conference discussed the broad bases of Chinese finance, and the details of advances for the payment of troops.

The Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office has applied to the "Six-Power" Governments to participate in the loan, but no Austro-Hungarian delegate was present at the conference.

Reuter wires from Paris.—It is understood that it has been intimated that Austria's proposal with regard to her inclusion in the "Six-Power" group connected with the Chinese loan would make the scheme unworkable but that every facility would be offered to allow Austria to take part in the scheme financially.

In the House of Commons on the same instant Sir Edward Gray, replying to Mr. Ginnell, said that Government would not give diplomatic support to any loan which did not provide adequate guarantees for proper expenditure of the proceeds and satisfactory securities for payment of principal and interest. Government would refuse to approve any loan the conditions of which infringed the policy of the "open door" in Manchuria or Mongolia, as regarded British commerce.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg:—A telegram from Peking states that in view of the disquieting situation in Kashgar, the Russian Minister has informed the Chinese Government that if the local authorities are unable to protect the lives and property of Russian subjects there Russia will be compelled to take measures, Tibet.

So far as information has been received the situation in Tibet is that the Chinese soldiery are now more or less surrounded by Tibetans in the southern part of Lhasa, their ammunition is nearly exhausted and they are in sore straits for supplies, depending largely for food on dead transport animals. As already stated, the attacking armed Tibetans number from 15,000 to 20,000. Many are armed with modern rifles and there is reason to suppose that the Chinese will be unable to hold out beyond the end of the month, and may come to terms earlier if the Tibetans are still prepared to come to an agreement.

The Dalai Lama's officials are very reticent as to news from Lhasa. The inference to be drawn from this is that things are not altogether favourable from a Tibetan point of view. Mr. Bell, the Political Officer, arrived here to-day to confer with the Dalai Lama. This may mark a new stage in the progress of events. As far as can be known fighting still seems to be going on in and around Lhasa.

Afghanistan.

A FRONTIER correspondent states that advanced parties of Afghan tribal levies have entered Khost. Regular troops are slowly following them. Trade between Kurram and Ghazni is said to have been suspended, owing to the rebellion in Khost, as there is no security for caravans using the usual route.

Russia.

The political turmoil is becoming more acute. The Opposition has proclaimed a general strike in favour of universal suffrage. A huge demonstration of 50,000 people was held on the 23rd instant and a collision took place with the police. Many shots were fired and shop windows and street lamps destroyed. At noon two persons had been killed and 65 injured.

The Hindu University.

THE Hon. Pundit Madan Mohan Malaviya has had a successful tour in Ajmer-Merwara in connection with the Hindu University scheme. The total subscriptions up to date from the district amount to over Rs. 50,000. Pandit Sukhdeo Prasad, C.I.E., retired Minister of Marwar, has promised Rs. 10,000.

New Delhi.

Good progress is being made with the construction of the temporary offices and houses for the Government of India along the Alipore Road. The buildings are on the bungalow plan, and one of brick and the others of light but permanent material. The unhealthy Darya (Ganj) Cantonment is to be vacated next cold weather, in favour of the quarters in the old Cantonment site close to ridge.

The Press Act.

THE press at Amritsar, at which the Vakil is published, has been called upon to furnish a security of Rs. 1,000 by the District Magistrate.

Moslem Education in Madras.

THE Muslim Educational Conference of South India will be held at Bangalore on the 27th, 28th and 29th July at the invitation of the Mysore Mahomedan Central Association. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim has been elected president and a sub-committee has been appointed to arrange the draft programme for the Conference and special lecturers have been selected to tour round and popularise the objects of the Conference throughout the Presidency.

Mr. Montagu's Speech.

THE following resolution has been adopted by the Bengal Presidency Muslim League. "That the League views with alarm and surprise the remarks made by Mr. Montagu regarding the rights and position of the Mahomedans of Eastern Bengal, particularly, and of India generally, and emphatically protest against such remarks which are based on ignorance or misconception of facts and that the League affirms that it is a mistake to suppose that Indian Mussalmans are not a homogeneous nationality, and that East Bengal Mussalman have little or no relation with those outside Bengal."

Similar resolutions have also been passed by the Punjab Moslem League, the Madras Moslem League, and the Burma Moslem League.

TETE À TETE

WHEN we published on the 4th instant the contradiction sent to us by the Hon Messrs. Haque and Sinha about their "fugitive pilgrimage of assurance," we had stated that "our informant was no other than one of the two hon gentlemen who have so emphatically contradicted the statement." We had said on that occasion that "we do not publish the name nor the occasion—yet," but we had also stated that "we shall have to do it if pressed by our informant." When we wrote this we had some little hope that our informant would press us. For obvious reasons, however, we have been disappointed. But surely the Beharee, that could find nothing better than to chronicle all our sins in its sole leading articles, in three successive issues, in no less than eight and a half columns, and that had threatened us in the verse of a great Urdu poet,

جو ہم کو کہتا تو ہوتا رہتا

surely the Beharee could not remain tongue-tied. It had greatly encouraged us to build up tremendous expectations of a still more vituperative reply, comprising a whole week's output of Billingsgate literature, and spread over seventeen columns. When a whole week of silence was over, and we published on the 11th instant three letters, and confirmatory extracts from a fourth, giving the lie direct to the hon. pilgrims of Behar, we were certain of receiving, what the Beharee calls, another "contradiction pure and simple"—of course, under registered cover, and with "acknowledgment due." Our contemporary, the Patrika, had devoted a whole leading article to the subject, hoping that the hon gentlemen "are likely to set the matter right by another contradiction." Another contemporary, the Englishman, referred to this "storm in a tea-cup", and was of opinion that the next letter of the hon gentlemen to us would be interesting reading. Here were three Calcutta journals, of three different types and representing different sets of views, all agreeing in the expectation of another "lavour" from the "fugitive pilgrims of assurance." Need we say we are terribly sick at heart, for the bone has been deterred too long? Like Hamlet, the hon. gentlemen seem to say, "The rest is silence." That may be, but silence need not be rest—if we can help it. We "pause for a reply." Is it not strange that two eminent lawyers, who must have often and often tried to snatch a reply when none was due to them in a court of law, are now tongue-tied at the bar of the public? Be that as it may, there is a little green oasis of speech in this Sahara of silence. It is the private property of a Mr. Shiweshwar Dayal, who would have us know that he is not only an M.A., but also a B.L. He writes to us and refers to the three correspondents who have "rushed forward" to contradict the contradiction of the Hon. Messrs. Haque and Sinha. But may not "fools" rush in where these two Behar "angels" feared for four days to tread? Mr. Shiweshwar Dayal refers also to our "editorial skill in concealing the names" of their correspondents, and calls it "highly improper and objectionable." Well, there is some such thing as sport, and we should not like to kill a brace of Behar foxes after the very first gallop. We would give the Reynards' another chance. If Mr. Shiweshwar Dayal,—M.A. and B.L.—would earn our gratitude, we trust he would induce Messrs. Haque and Sinha to demand from us the particulars of "respectability and veracity" of our correspondents. Only two classes of persons are entitled to demand these details, our subscribers and the contradicted contradictors. Unlike Mr. Shiweshwar Dayal—we hope he will forgive us if we do not repeat his academic qualifications as often as he would like—none of our subscribers has attributed to us the desire of "clever and unscrupulous journalism"—of whom he has evidently considerable experience—namely, of "manufacturing corroborative correspondence." As for the hon. gentlemen—who possess the lion's share of what Mr. Shiweshwar

Dayal calls "the interest of all concerned"—they are evidently in no mood to ask for anything in their own interest but a safe hiding place. It is clearly a case of silent complainers, but a voluble witness. We may state that, in this instance, it is at our option whether the names of our correspondents should be published or not, and we prefer to be persuaded to disclose them by the brace of Imperial Councillors. Should they ask us to do so, by writing to us direct, or—preferably—through a court of law, we assure Mr. Shiweshwar Dayal, M.A., B.L., that we shall only jump at the opportunity. We have since learnt on the authority of other Imperial Councillors that the fraud was far more extensively advertised than we had believed, and so our witnesses will form a line that like that of Banquo's royal issue, would "stretch out to the crack of doom." We had erstwhile praised Behar as the Province where the hen and the lamb lie together. But who ever expected that they would lie in this manner?

مدعی سب کو چست

EVIDENTLY a misunderstanding prevails about the last date on which formal application should be received for the "Hamdard" Debentures. In the prospectus published in our issue of 27th April last it was stated that "as it is of the utmost importance that the Hamdard should commence its career as soon as possible, and the Press should be set up without delay, it is earnestly solicited that applications for Debentures, together with the amount of deposit, should be forwarded within two or three days of the receipt of this prospectus." In another place intending purchasers of the Debentures were invited to send their applications "as early as possible, but it is hoped, not later than 10th May next." From the enquiries of several intending purchasers it appears that they think the time for applying for the Debentures expired on the 10th instant. That, however, is not the case.

Desiring to place orders for machinery, type, printing furniture, paper and printing accessories almost immediately, and to launch the paper with as little delay as possible, those who had informally expressed their intention of buying the Debentures were requested to send the applications without any avoidable delay. It was hoped that this would be done by the 10th May, though it was naturally impossible to fix any date, for all the available Debentures could have possibly been subscribed for before that date, or many could have remained unsold even after it. On account of a misunderstanding about the last date, a good many Debentures are still available. Considering that nearly 650 different persons informally applied for no less than 1,500 Debentures, it is unthinkable that the 3,500 Debentures, which it has been decided to issue should remain unsold for long. To a great extent the misunderstanding about the last date for applying has been responsible for the delay; no doubt some of the intending purchasers have been waiting for a reminder, for there is something in the atmospheric condition of India which makes people put off till to-morrow or even the day after what they can and should do to-day. Reminders are, however, now being posted, but if only our readers knew that the mere postage of so many reminders costs us a small fortune, not to mention the labour of the clerical staff and the expenditure of stationery and the printing bill, we are sure they would not wait to be reminded. We would therefore earnestly request such of them as have promised to purchase a number of Debentures and have not yet sent in the formal application duly filled in (with a deposit of Rs. 5 for each Debenture) to do so without further delay. Nearly a month has already passed since the prospectus was issued, and although the response has been very hopeful, there is yet a deficiency to make up. We trust in another fortnight not a single Debenture would be left available for sale; for if the Comrade is to have its own Press, as the first step towards a reduction of subscription, and if the Hamdard must be launched well in advance of the Government of India's advent in the new Capital, the order for the Press must be placed with the suppliers in England and Turkey at the latest by the 15th of June. But unless we have in hand Rs. 17,500 as deposit, we shall not be able to do so, and delay is as much undesirable in the interest of our readers as in our own.

IN AN April issue of our well-known Egyptian contemporary, Almanar, a brief account was given of the reception that was accorded in Bombay to Syed Rashid Raza Effendi, the learned Editor of Almanar, on his way to Lucknow, where he had come at the invitation of the "Nadwah" to preside at its last annual session. The correspondent of our contemporary expressed the hope that the visit of the famous Egyptian scholar would lead to the growth of closer relations between India and Egypt in matters religious and educational. The hope, which we too in India as fervently shared, has been realised as far as one such visit goes. The learned visitor was received everywhere with great enthusiasm. His addresses at the "Nadwah," the Aligarh College and the Deoband Madrassa were listened to by crowded audiences with rapt attention. The fame of Syed Rashid Raza as a great educational and religious reformer had preceded him to this country. It is unfortunately true, as some of our Egyptian contemporaries have observed, that the knowledge of Arabic is confined to a few amongst the Indian Mussalmans, and consequently the number of those who can follow the developments of the Egyptian reform movement with intelligent interest is limited. Fortunately, however, it is also true that, though an overwhelming majority even of the Mussalmans who have received modern education is ignorant of the sacred language of Islam, they feel an ever-widening interest in the affairs of the whole Islamic world and try to keep themselves in touch with their brethren abroad through the contemporary literature to which the English language has given them an access. Then, again, the modern press has brought the Islamic world nearer in every part. The views of the Egyptian and the Turkish papers on topics of general Islamic interest are translated and published by the vernacular press throughout India. This process is growing with the growth of the interest it has helped to create. The average Indian Mussalman knows more about his co-religionists in Turkey, Arabia, Egypt, and other parts of Africa, in China and Russia than his predecessor of the last generation, and he is already beginning to perceive the essential unity of the secular problem that the Mussalmans all over the world have got to solve. Syed Rashid Raza and the movement of which he is the symbol are not wholly unknown to the average Indian Moslem. He can fully understand the scope and purpose of the great effort at reform which Sheikh Mohamed Abdu, the father of modern educational and religious movements in Egypt, organised and developed for the regeneration of the Egyptian Mussalmans, for he himself has been brought up amidst the chastening influences of a similar reform movement in India. The task of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was essentially of the same nature and magnitude that confronted the Mussalmans in every other part of the world. It has everywhere called forth the same type of reformer equipped with similar ideas and almost identical methods. The message of Syed Rashid Raza to the Indian Mussalmans, with its note of earnestness, sincerity and love for Islam, was delivered in tones of passionate eloquence. They recognised in it the accents they had first begun to hear upwards of 40 years ago. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had asked the Mussalmans to get out of the ignorance and prejudice into which they had sunk, to understand the liberal spirit of Islam, to interpret it not as a bundle of shibboleths and conventions to which it had been reduced by ignorant mullahs and mullah-ridden fanatics, but as the most practical, complete, and satisfying philosophy of life and conduct and to bring it to bear on the conditions of secular progress. The burden of Syed Rashid Raza's profoundly learned discourses was the same. It must have impressed all those who had the privilege of hearing him with the underlying unity of the Islamic renaissance throughout the world. The main lines of intellectual progress and social reconstruction are the same. It may, however, be noted that allowance shall have to be made everywhere for the differences of environment. Variations in minor features of the development of the various Moslem communities should rather be encouraged than suppressed. Insistence on the criterion would must be avoided, for all such attempt however laudable, are unscientific. Syed Rashid Raza's first visit to this country has done much to stimulate interest in Egyptian affairs. We hope it will not be his last. We wish there were a greater and much more frequent intercourse between India and Egypt.

The agitation that a section of the Punjab Press is still carrying on against the Punjab Land Alienation Act has long ceased to be reasonable. Experience has shown the Act to have been a beneficent measure which has saved the sturdy class of yeomen in the province from perpetual serfdom. The results of its operation have been carefully and exhaustively set forth with a wealth of statistical detail in the annual reports that have been issued by the provincial authorities ever since the Act came into force. Even a cursory glance at these reports would convince any fair-minded person that the Act has eminently fulfilled the objects for which it was designed. Its critics, perhaps, need to be reminded that the measure was primarily intended to prevent the agricultural land from passing into the hands of the money lenders who lent money to the agriculturist at exorbitant rates of interest and within a short time drove him out of his land. The peasant proprietor was rapidly being bought out of his paternal acres by a class of men who knew nothing of agriculture, but had accumulated enough money by usurious methods to set up as landlords. The possession of land is supposed to confer a certain social status and dignity, and every petty baniya who had thriven by methods that can not bear a close scrutiny got some simple peasant into his clutches and soon relieved him of his landed property. Beside the huge economic evil to which this process gave birth, there was also the further danger of questions of immense political gravity rising into prominence. The agrarian discontent, if the process had not been checked, would have grown into frightful dimensions, while it would have caused intense misery and wretchedness in a manly, brave and independent race of men who supply the finest soldiers of the Indian army. It was on the strength of these considerations that legislation was resorted to. The Act has been justified by its results. The non-agricultural classes, such as the banyas, cannot naturally be expected to relish a piece of legislation that puts a drastic check on their land-grabbing instincts, and their organs in the provincial press are still keeping up a feeble outcry. The Punjabee in its issue of the 18th instant, stumbles through a few figures which it tries to manipulate without success. It gives up the task in rage and begins to swear at the trans-border Pathan, who seems to have got on the nerves of our contemporary. The Pathan, says the Punjabee, can acquire land, while men of brains and capital, "who also have been hereditary owners of soil, have been arbitrarily excluded from acquisition of land." There may be men of "brains and capital" whom the Act has debarred from turning into agriculturists, very much to their own and their neighbours' advantage, but no "hereditary owner of the soil has been excluded from acquisition of land" unless the "owner" has also acquired his "heredity" like his "land." As regards the danger of the small land holders being swallowed up by the big magnate, the question is primarily one of agricultural indebtedness and the thriftless and improvident habits of the peasants. The growth of the Co-operative Credit Movement and the agricultural banks will solve the problem. The Land Alienation Act has as little to do with its existence as the winds and the tides.

As might well have been expected, the financial needs of China are being fully exploited by international diplomacy after its most approved fashion. As soon as an inkling about the intention of the new Republican Government to raise a large loan for administrative purposes got abroad, there was a huge commotion in the great financial circles of the world, and early bids were made by some enterprising banking firms to effect the "deal" before other competitors appeared on the scene. The Great Powers, including America and Japan, were, however, on the look out and they immediately stepped in to prevent the loan from sinking ingloriously into a mere private transaction. It offered the one chance for which modern diplomacy ceaselessly works at high-pressure. The chance was seized and the loan was—to use the parlance affected by the money-market expert—internationalised. Six Great Powers, Germany, France, England, Russia, America and Japan agreed to participate in the loan on equal terms. The usual conditions regarding the guarantees and the disposal of the money were framed and a bankers' syndicate representing the Powers began its meetings in London to settle the terms with the Chinese representatives and work out the details of the loan amongst themselves. The Syndicate has not yet reached the end of its labours. Meanwhile a curious incident has been reported which illustrates with striking vividness the real nature of the motives that inspire some of the Powers in this dubious enterprise. A "hitch" would seem to have occurred in the conference of the bankers "due to the stipulation of bankers from France, Germany, United States and Britain that each of the six Powers taking part in the loan must provide funds for its own share from its own resources." But, as is natural enough, Russia desires permission "for any Power so wishing to raise funds for this purpose abroad," and Japan supports her. Now, it need hardly be explained that Russia is kept out of chronic bankruptcy by French money. She has not a single free rouble in her pocket to lend to China. The Japanese finances too are not in a flourishing condition. Yet the desire for political aggrandisement has prompted both Russia and Japan to take part in the Chinese loan, even though they may have to borrow from others. The transparent crudeness of these tactics can hardly disguise the real purposes for which they are designed. China knows well enough the history and character of the loans that have been from time to time imposed on the weaker nations, circumstanced like herself. She may be driven to accept similar bargains by stringent financial needs. But she can have no illusions about the altruism of High Diplomacy and High Finance.

The Comrade.

The European Diplomacy and the War.

WITH the Italian attack on the Dardanelles and the series of pre-concerted descents on the Aegean islands, the Turko-Italian war has entered a new phase. From the standpoint of pure military strategy and in relation to the Tripolitan campaign the new developments can have no decisive consequence. Indeed, the net military value of these proceedings has so far been that they have stamped the whole Italian enterprise with absolute incompetence. Their face value is the much-needed diversion they have supplied to the impatient "Imperialists" of Rome. The transient illusion of strength created by the display of naval prowess cannot, however, alter the fundamental difficulties of the task. Nor can it be taken to be the final motive and justification of so radical a change in the strategic centre of gravity. After a careful analysis of the grave and ominous symptoms fast gathering athwart the new diplomatic situation, it becomes exceedingly simple to realise that it is in the setting of the new diplomatic forces that the true explanation of the Italian action is to be sought. In order to make a clear presentment of the new situation we shall have naturally to take into the fullest account Italy's colonial ambitions, the limitations of her strength, and the manoeuvring of her diplomacy.

The elementary fact to be borne in mind is that Italy set out on her Tripolitan enterprise with absolute certainty of success. The greatest obstacles in her way were the existing international usage, the treaty obligations and the public conscience of Europe. She lightly brushed them aside by taking into her confidence some of the Powers without whose consent or, at any rate, passive acquiescence she could never hope to undertake the conquest of Tripoli. France was already pledged to support her; and it has never been authoritatively denied that British neutrality was not promised to her beforehand. Having been assured of non-interference from quarters most likely to interfere, she could well afford to ignore all sentimental considerations about international morality and treaty obligations. They had been set at naught by almost every European Power within living memory. Austria had defied them in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina. France was tearing them to shreds in her dealings with the Moors. A successful aggression was its own justification, and international laws and treaties could be confidently trusted to accommodate themselves to the just accomplis. As to her success, she counted on her strong fleet, her large and well-equipped army, the long and patient study that she had given even to the minutest details of the expedition and, above all, on the unpreparedness of the Turks, the defencelessness of the Tripolitan coast towns and the utter inadequacy of the Turkish garrison. Indeed, the confidence with which she embarked on the conquest of Turkish North Africa, may be gauged from the fact that she, of her own free will, pledged herself in the hearing of all Europe to respect the integrity of the Ottoman Empire in Europe and Asia and to severely localise the area of conflict. In some super-benevolent mood she even circularised the Balkan States that she would view with strong disapproval any disturbance of the status quo in European Turkey. The warships made a promenade along the coast of Tripoli, and a fleet of convoys landed several divisions of the flower of the Italian army. There was an outburst of patriotic enthusiasm such as even the Italian Nationalism had not witnessed at its birth. The coast towns of Tripoli, Derna, Tobruk, and Benghazi were occupied in rapid succession. Grandiloquent proclamations were made, governors were appointed to assume direct sovereign authority and the Arabs were reported to be hailing the advent of their deliverers with shouts of acclamation. The world looked on with amazement at the lightning suddenness and daring of the coup.

However, the day of reckoning dawned rather sooner than even the Turks could hope for and the glorious but short-lived romance of Italian imperialism began to vanish like a dream. Turkey resolved to sell her North African Province with her life. The blow would have been staggering to her for her patience, her marvellous staying power, the newly-acquired pride and patriotism of the Ottoman nation and the cool courage with which the Young Turk statesmen set themselves to grapple with the situation. They made a strong appeal to the European Powers on the basis of their numerous treaty rights and on the grounds of international law and justice but were soon convinced of its futility. Diplomacy is mainly concerned with facts backed by bayonets. They had to fight for their honour, their Empire, their life as an independent and respected nation. Some of the younger officers of the Turkish army crossed over to Tripoli to organise a life-and-death struggle against the invading hosts. The news of the Italian invasion had spread like wildfire throughout the Islamic Africa and the Arabs of Tripoli began to flock to the Turkish standard in defence of their homes, their faith, and their liberties. The volunteer forces were speedily put through a rough military discipline and were organised into a magnificent weapon of attack under the able, energetic, and untiring guidance of the Turkish commanders. At all points of occupation the Italian troops were invested and daring and well-directed attacks began to be delivered on their entrenched positions. Meanwhile the Ain Zara massacres gave to the world the true measure of the Italian army. The panic-stricken soldiery that could wash "the stain of Adowa" in the hecatombs of women, children and aged men was scarcely fit to face a brave and chivalrous enemy in honest battle. Month after month wore on and the only progress the Italian campaign made was the perfection of the defences under the cover of the guns of the fleet. In every stray encounter the Arabs drove the Italians back into trenches and captured quantities of ammunition and rifles. After eight months the position of affairs is exactly as it was at the time of the landing of the Italian army. An expeditionary force of 125,000 men under the command of 24 generals and a vast number of officers of the general staff is pinned to the coast line by a handful of Turkish regulars, assisted by Arab volunteers, under the direction of a Turkish Colonel. The resourcefulness, strategy, and heroism displayed by Colonels Fethi Bey and Nishat Bey in the Tripolitaine and Major Enver Bey in Cyrenaica, when fully told, will rank amongst the greatest feats of defensive warfare. With the poorest materials at their command, without even the necessary equipment, they are holding at bay a powerfully equipped army trained on the latest European model, and well could the Sultan feel proud of his "children" and send them his salutations. They have deserved well of their nation, their sovereign and their God. The strongest argument of the Turkish Foreign Minister, while replying to the inquiries of the Powers regarding peace, was that the Ottoman Government could not throw overboard the brave army whose magnificent defence had already added a brilliant page to the Ottoman military history.

The failure of the Italian army has recoiled on the policy of the Italian Government. It, first of all, gained the derision of the whole world by hastening to annex what it was powerless to conquer. This ridiculous farce was, however, based on an astute diplomatic calculation. By taking this step the Italian statesmen sought to create a pretence of irrevocability. Europe would certainly respect Italy's "honour" even though it could not help her in her "conquest." It now only remained for her Government to prepare the ground by diplomacy for European mediation with "annexation" as its basis. But before diplomacy could effectively do its work in the repose of the chancelleries, it was necessary to make the situation intolerable to the neutral Powers by causing widespread trouble and irritation. With this object in view the Italian fleet was instructed to harass neutral shipping and commerce. Meanwhile a couple of Italian cruisers in the Red Sea began to shell various points on the Arabian coast with a view to exasperate the Arabs to revolt. Beirut was bombarded later on because the possibility of damage to many foreign interests in the city would, it was understood, react on the European diplomacy. Arms and ammunitions were dumped on the southern extremity of Yemen, and Syed Idris with his followers was incited to revolt. The rebellion has been almost crushed by the Turks, and it may be interesting to note that amongst the killed and wounded that the rebels left on the field in a recent fight, fifteen Italian officers have been found disguised as Arabs. Many Italian agents are touring throughout the Balkan provinces inciting people to rebellion by handsome bribes. Every possible means has been adopted to create a general sense of insecurity in the European situation.

Concurrently with these activities the Italian diplomacy has been busy seeking help in all quarters, and its efforts have not been entirely unsuccessful. It has found a willing agent in the Muscovite, who is never known to have failed fishing in troubled waters, particularly at the expense of Turkey. The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph wrote on the 1st May —

Those who know are more and more persuaded here that Russia is privately coming to some understanding with Italy. I am afraid that the repeated denials of any such agreement uttered from St. Petersburg are received with scepticism in Paris. It will, of course, be remembered that it was the Russian Government which took the initiative months ago in consulting the Powers on the question of possible mediation between Turkey and Italy. Any such mediation was stifled from the start by Italy's rash proclamation of the annexation of Tripoli and the ratification of the annexation by Parliament. Mediation, nevertheless, was proposed by Russia. Had it come to anything it could have been only at the expense of Turkey. It may, perhaps, have escaped the public recollection that at the outset the Russian intention of proposing mediation was strenuously denied. Nevertheless, the proposal was eventually made. Denials of a private understanding between Russia and Italy are now taken with a grain of salt in consequence.

The Italian motive for concluding a secret pact with Russia is only too manifest. The Russian motive, equally strong, requires some elucidation. The Balance of Power in Europe has been delicately adjusted on the lines of the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente. Not only Russia wants to get a free passage through the Dardanelles by supporting Italy in terminating the war on her own terms, but also desires to wean the latter from the Triple Alliance. This is, perhaps, the only revenge she can take on Germany and Austria for the humiliation she had to bear in 1908. It was on the strength of Russian sympathy or perhaps definite assurance of support that Italy attacked the Dardanelles. The Straits were at once closed and several ships laden with Russian grain and merchandise were held up in the channel. As was pre-arranged, the Russian protest was lodged at the Sublime Porte. The Italian calculation was that the closing of the Straits would lead to an enormous dislocation of international trade and the tide of feeling would turn against Turkey, in addition to the opportunity it would afford Russia to open afresh the whole question of the Dardanelles. The Ottoman Government has, however, handled the situation with admirable tact and courage. While claiming full territorial rights over the Dardanelles waters, which the British Government had recognised to the full, the Porte decided to open the Straits before the general feeling in Europe could be roused against its action. As matters stand now, the rights of Turkey to defend herself are recognised by every Power in Europe, while her solicitude to avoid, consistent with her own safety, all possible harm to international shipping has earned her universal praise and gratitude. The tactics of the Italian diplomacy have, in this instance, come home to roost.

All this, however, is a poor comfort to derive from the Dardanelles incident. Very grave complications seem to lie ahead. Russian diplomacy is dangerously active again. Italy is desperate and Muscovite unscrupulous, and their secret co-operation at this juncture is the gravest menace to the European peace. The statement of the Russian Foreign Minister has produced marked uneasiness in France, where the unusual warmth of the Russian Minister's expressions of friendship for Germany has led to inferences not very flattering to the Dual Alliance. It has been inferred that Russia is being drawn into the orbit of German diplomacy. The famous Potsdam meeting had left a trail behind, it has only just dawned on the French Press that the trail lies perilously across the Entente principles. The Russian diplomacy has been aiming at cross insurance without caring much for the loyal constancy it owes to its public engagements. In Persia, in Mongolia, in respect of Turkey, its guiding principles can not but be thoroughly Muscovite. The note of alarm recently sounded by the well-informed St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily Telegraph has come none too soon. The danger of Russia drifting apart from England as soon as her most pressing needs have been met by French money and English prestige, and pursuing her own aims, with her own time-honoured methods, ought to have been present in the calculations of the British diplomatists. The Balance of Power is dangerously near its final smash. Russia has admirably exploited Anglo-French suspicions of Germany and has not scrupled to hobnob with the Teuton. Diplomatic forces have lost their equilibrium and are swaying to the side-winds that have begun to blow from Rome and St. Petersburg. The speech of the Russian Foreign Minister, by the "very effrontery of its official optimism" has led the British and the French Press furiously to think. "The lesson which lies on the surface of his speech," says the Nation, "is that the elaborate continental system which M. Delcasse sketched and Sir Edward Grey perfected has crumbled like a house of cards. . . But even as we sought to play off one Power against the other, the whole aspect of the problem changed. Russia, in 1907, seemed to be definitely ranged in the Franco-British camp. To-day she bestrides the line which divides the two European groups. The event has shown the folly of our calculations. We have discovered that Russia has neither the will to keep her engagements nor the ability to act a 'brilliant second' in a European duel. The adventure of the Balance of Power has ended as it was bound to end."

Will the lessons of the present situation be utilised for the rehabilitation of the Concert? It must be clearly understood that Turkey has no special reason to welcome the resurrection of an instrument which was primarily designed to subject her affairs to organised European coercion. But the circumstances have considerably altered the character as well as the proportions of the problem now facing European diplomacy. The Turko-Italian war in its latest phase has revealed the existence of dangers to the world's peace that no responsible European statesman can ignore. The Dardanelles incident has shown what Russia would be prepared to do for the development of her designs. Her direct, though secret, incitement of Italy has thrown the systems of entente and alliances wholly out of gear. A distracted Government reeling under the shock of a costly misadventure will continue to be open to incitements even more reckless and mischievous. Can it be presumed, therefore, that the situation with all its potential dangers will bring the Concert into life again? The problem that the Concert will have to deal with is simple, though it requires a drastic treatment. Russia must be held in check and Italy should be forced to adhere to her deliberate pledge regarding the localisation of the war. We have been absolutely against intervention in any shape or form, for we could not see how it could be usefully invoked without detriment to Turkish interests. The aggressive designs that have recently come to light on the part of Russia, however, urgently call for European intervention on the lines we have indicated. We are aware there is hardly any great Power in Europe that may not at this time be cherishing overt or covert designs on some part or other of the Ottoman Empire. Leaving aside the notorious Russian designs and the ambitions of the petty Balkan principalities, Austria regards Macedonia and Albania within her own sphere of aspiration. The Teuton is preparing to seek for his place in the sun in Asia Minor. France is fast developing claims on Syria, while the British occupation of Egypt, according to some accounts, is about to be "regularised". A persistent rumour has grown up of late that Anglo-Turkish relations are moving rapidly in the direction of a formal entente. Such a consummation would be welcomed by all Moslems, though we hope it would not be the result of the rumoured "deal" about Egypt. However, in spite of the absence of all disinterested desire amongst the Great Powers to help Turkey in the conclusion of a peace that would be truly honourable, it is still possible to expect that they will suppress Russian menace as well as its primary cause and effect, the Italian hooliganism in the Egean, for the protection of the most vital interests of Europe. Our own Government is most fitted, by virtue of its naval supremacy, to intervene with effect. In view of the manifold dangers likely to affect British commercial and political interests that have emerged on the scene, and which drew forth one of its few strong leaders from the Times, we do not see if the obligations to maintain British neutrality any longer exist. The declaration of Egyptian neutrality was a mistake about which no satisfactory explanation has been given. To have exercised that neutrality with a peculiarly harsh and petty fogging rigour against the Turks reflected no credit on the methods of Lord Kitchener. If, however, a distinct improvement has taken place in Turko-British relations, we are sure they would be enormously strengthened by a decisive British action at this stage. A Turko-British understanding would be hailed with enthusiasm by the whole Islamic world. It would speedily become a great moral asset of the British Empire. It would effectively safeguard British interests in Persia. It would rob the Triple Alliance of all its aggressive terrors. It would be the surest guarantee of peace in the Balkans, the storm-centre of Europe. Is Sir Edward Grey capable of this achievement? The next few weeks will definitely settle this question.

Provincial Finance.

THE Resolution issued by the Government of India in the Finance Department, dealing with the Provincial Settlements, defines the policy that will henceforth govern the financial relations between the Government of India and the local Governments. The new policy is based on the recommendations of the Decentralisation Commission and was clearly set forth by the Hon. the Finance Member in his Financial Statement for the year 1910-11. After the local Governments had expressed their opinions on the contemplated re-adjustments in the existing financial relations, the sanction of the Secretary of State was sought for and obtained. The present Resolution embodies "the decisions which have been reached upon the various points at issue."

The changes introduced in the existing arrangements are not of a radical character. After a clear analysis of the principles underlying the existing Provincial Settlements, the Government of India proceed to explain that there exist no grounds at the present time to justify any radical departure from the existing system. Before the Royal Commission reported, the system had three distinct features. In the first place it was quasi-permanent, i.e., the Settlements were subject to revision only in extraordinary circumstances and in cases where a glaring disparity had grown up in provincial receipts and expenditure. Secondly, the distribution of revenues between the Provincial and Central Governments was ordinarily made with direct reference to the needs of each Province. Thirdly, the distribution of the revenues accruing from various sources was effected by the method of setting apart certain main heads of revenues, called "divided heads," which yielded the residue in the shape of a fixed fractional share for Imperial purposes. In the general principles of this system the Government of India desire to make no change. After considering the various alternative methods of financing the Imperial Government which were discussed by the Royal Commission, they came to the conclusion that "it was clearly preferable to abide by the main lines of a system which had gradually been built up to meet the needs of the country, than to look about for an untried scheme of greater abstract perfection."

There is, however, one direction in which further development is desirable, and that is the giving of greater permanency to the Settlements. An effort to attain, as far as possible, some degree of finality in financial arrangements has been rendered necessary by the loss of the opium revenue as well as by the heavy recurring expenditure that shall have to be provided for education and expenditure out of the Imperial revenues. Provinces will henceforth be provided, once and for all, with Settlements so framed that local Governments may develop their administrations from their own assigned sources. They will also be warned not to expect assistance from the Imperial funds except in cases of unusual stringency. This will have the effect of imparting precision to mutual relations and increase the interest of the local Governments in the husbanding and direction of their own resources. It will also increase provincial independence in financial matters and allow greater freedom of action within definite limits. With these objects in view definite rules have been laid down which will govern the financial arrangements in the future. The Government of India do not think that the existing Settlements are unjust or inequitable. After a "haggling" of many years the Settlements have achieved a rough equity and there seems to exist no need for drastic change. In some minor details the y need adjustments which have been carefully carried out;

The policy of "doles" has been, in the absence of the complete provincial autonomy, considered to be necessary. The Government of India retain full power to lay down the conditions on which the grants are to be made. The important question of granting powers to local Governments for raising funds for schemes of provincial utility by provincial taxation has been considered at length, and weighty reasons have been advanced by the Government of India in support of their view that no such extension of powers seems at present to be desirable. The proposal to allow the provinces to raise loans for their own needs when necessary has also been found open to serious objections. On the whole the changes introduced embody a distinct advance in the direction of increased provincial independence and stability in financial matters. A corresponding relaxation in the limits imposed on the spending powers of the Local Governments and Administrations has been decided upon by the Government of India. A number of proposals framed in this behalf have received the sanction of the Secretary of State. The Government of India have dealt with the requirements of the local Governments in no niggardly spirit; and it now rests with the latter to make the best use of the new opportunities and pave the way for the full development of the financial autonomy to which the central Government look forward with hope and confidence.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND

	Rs.	As.	P.
Messrs. Habibullah and Abdus Samad, Delhi	...	25	0 0
Through Nisar Ahmed, Esq., Bharatpur	...	100	0 0
Through Haji Qadir Bakhsh, Esq., Benares
Musalliyar Jama Masjid, Benares	...	4	10 9
Mamnunul Hasan, Esq.	...	9	8 0
Through Munshi Nazeer Ali Sahib	...	45	2 0
Umdul Sahib	...	1	6 0
Bazaar Collection	...	1	0 0
Messrs. Abdul Kareem and Abdul Aziz	...	4	0 0
Mir Yakul Ali Sahib, Leather Merchant	...	1	8 0
Sabhan Khan Sahib	...	1	0 0
Ramzani Sahib	...	1	6 0
Ali Sahib	...	1	8 0
Abdul Wahid Sahib of Nidasar	...	1	0 0
Maulvi Md. Husain Sahib	...	1	0 6
Shabbu Khan Sahib, Mohalla Salimpore	...	5	0 0
Akaf Hossain Sahib	...	4	6 0
Kamr Abdul Ali Sahib of Mahmudpore	...	1	0 0
Haji Abdul Rahim Sahib	...	2	12 0
Haji Kadir Baksh Sahib	...	11	4 3
Minor Subscriptions	...	2	13 0
Nawab Zada Abdul Hamid Sahib, Ludhiana	...	50	0 0
Through Ahmed Ollah Khan, Esq., Sherwani Bhickampur	...	495	0 0
Fuqar Rahman, Esq., Patna	...	8	0 0
Habibulla Khan, Esq., Kadasura	...	5	0 0
All Muhammad, Esq., Bareilly	...	10	0 0
Mahmud Hasan Abbasi, Esq., Kakori	...	3	6 0
Moinuddin Ahmed, Esq., Kalihatti	...	10	0 0
Through Muhammad Khuda Bakhsh, Esq., Habibgunj, Silhat	...	90	0 0

	Rs.	As.	P.
Ali Husain Khan, Esq., Rahe	...	2	0 0
Muhammad Zamiruddin, Esq., Mohamedabad	...	3	8 0
Miraj Din, Esq., Moga	...	2	0 0
Akbar Khan, Esq., Nainital	...	1	0 0
Syed Makbul Ahmed, Esq., Bankipore	...	10	0 0
M. Abdullah, Esq., Budaun	...	5	0 0
Dr. Ahmed Mian, Sidhpur	...	60	0 0
Shah baz Khan Sahib, Guzerat	...	20	0 0
Through Md. Ahmed, Esq., Calicut—Messrs. P
Ummar Koya Hajee, P Velu Kurup; E. Abdulla;
K. M Mohi-ud-din Koya, Mr. Michial; B.
Mohamed, Rs. 2 each	...	12	0 0
Mohamed Yusuf Sahib	...	3	0 0
M. Hasan Koya, M. Havan Koya Hajee; T. M. Hasan
Hajee, M. Md. Haji; W. Avaran Koya Hajee;
M. Koyappani; P. Mohamed; K. Mohiuddin
Kutty; K. Mossa Koya; N. M. Mohiuddin Koya,
R. Imbichu Md. K. Abdullah Hajee, M. Chak
Kutty Koya, C. Mammoo; P. Mohiuddin Koya;
M. Ali Koya, C. A. Cunbi Moosa Co.; K. M
Hasan Koya, K. Mohiuddin Kutty Hajee
Mohammed, K. Kunbi Kalathan; M. Abdul
Razak, T. Md. Ibrahim; A. Koyali; K. Husain
Deedi; S. Abdul Rahman Ahmed Hajee; V. P
Abdul Rahman, S. Rahman & Co., P. P. Poker,
P. P. Koya Mohiuddin; A. Abdul Rahman--
Rs. 1 each	...	33	0 0
Minor Subscriptions	...	2	0 0
Azizur Rahman, Esq., Mirangunj	...	10	0 0
F. Ahmed, Esq., Gherdu	...	5	0 0
Miraj Din, Esq., Moga	...	2	0 0
Through Md. Wasi, Esq.
Syed Md. Ahsan Esq.	...	6	0 0
Al Khairat	...	11	12 0

Amount received during the fortnight	...	1,084	14 6
Less M O. and registration charges	...	0	8 0
		1,084	6 6
Amount previously acknowledged	...	15,781	11 6
		16,866	2 0

Anecdote.

AMONGST the many stories told concerning Coventry Patmore the poet, the following, perhaps, is one of the most amusing:—

When Patmore lived in his beautiful old house at Hastings, a kind of Harold Skimpole contrived to make his acquaintance.

"That fellow was one of the cleverest I ever came across," said Patmore, when speaking about him to a personal friend who relates the story.

"One day in the early part of our acquaintance he came to me for my advice. His wife had purchased a costume at one of the principal local drapers, but when an assistant was sent for to make certain alterations, the latter packed it up and carried it back to the shop. What should he do?"

"Go to Z—," I said, naming my lawyer; and off he started.

"Summon the people," said Z—; "that is what you had better do. But wait, have you paid for the dress? If not, send a cheque and summon them afterwards."

"On my word, I never thought of that," exclaimed the other, innocently; "and as I don't happen to have my purse, just oblige me with your cheque for the amount!"

"And I'll be hanged," added Coventry Patmore, chuckling, "if he didn't bamboozle the lawyer. Instead of stepping over the way he went straight home. The dress was never paid for, and Z— never got back his money."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

Reuter wired from Teheran — A Persian frontier official at Seistan reports that Afghans claim a considerable district on the frontier and have already erected border beacons.

The Government of India is expected to deal with the question of Afghan encroachments. The matter is not regarded as serious.

Owing to tribesmen seriously threatening Bandar Abbas, the Persian and the Alert arrived on Tuesday with a view to contingencies.

The situation at Bunder Abbas has improved as a consequence of the landing of troops and blue-jackets, and the threatening gathering of tribesmen is, according to the most recent information, rapidly dispersing, since it is proposed to re-embark the soldiers and sailors who were landed the other day, leaving however, a small addition to the Consular Guard for the next few days until the situation has finally cleared.

The tribesmen who recently attacked Bunder Abbas have now withdrawn, and the landing party from the Persian and Alert is therefore being re-embarked, while the seventh Rajputs are going back to Jask, extra Consular Guards only being left in case any further attack should be attempted. It seems that the tribesmen, who numbered some four hundred men, abandoned the waterworks they had seized immediately the blue-jackets advanced upon them, and their firing was so erratic that there were no British casualties in the fight. Two men of the "Persian," however, unfortunately lost their lives in the accidental upsetting of a boat in the landing. The attack on Bunder Abbas is a mere incident in the general anarchy which prevails throughout Persia, and no importance is attached to it.

Yeprim, the famous Armenian Chief of Police in Persia, who has done Persia much service, has been killed, it is alleged, by treachery, while operating against the ex-Shah's brother, Salarud Dauleh, near Hamadan.

Reuter wired from Teheran — The report that Yeprim was treacherously murdered is discredited. He was shot from the fort which was believed to be evacuated. Afterwards Yeprim's followers stormed the fort and killed all inside.

News from Persia shows that the outlook in Kerman has cleared, the rebels having dispersed, thanks to the support the Governor has received from the Persian Government.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, April 25

Considerable anxiety is caused here by the attitude of the Mullahs, who accuse the Cabinet of selling their countrymen and threaten a Holy War against foreigners. The Russian bombardment of the mosque at Meshed has strengthened the movement.

Syed Ali, the prime mover, has been arrested for seditious utterances. A deputation of Mullahs has informed the Regent that if he persists in his intention of leaving Persia at the present juncture he will be deposed. It is believed, indeed, that Nasr-ul-Mulk's European trip has been abandoned in consequence of the attitude of the Mullahs.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Berlin, April 26.

Telegrams from Teheran to the German Press depict a rather alarming state of things at the Persian capital.

M. Mornard, the Belgian Treasurer-General, is at loggerheads with the Government and Russian diplomacy seems to support his claims to exercise an unlimited control over all financial affairs, including the grant of concessions.

On the other hand, the clergy are preaching open revolt against the Cabinet, charging it with having sold the country to Russia. As a consequence, the chief Mujtahid of Teheran, Syed Ali, has been arrested, and the Grand Mujtahid of Nedjif has been compelled to issue a proclamation calling upon the people to restrain themselves and not to begin a civil war.

A Reuter's message from St. Petersburg states that the Russian Foreign Minister, M. Sazonoff, in his speech said that the situation in Persia, thanks to the agreement concluded with Great Britain in 1907, should give rise to no extraordinary complications. The unsatisfactory conditions of Russo-Persian relations was due to the irreconcilability of the Democratic Nationalist party towards Russia. It might be assumed that the present Persian Cabinet with the support of Russia and Great Britain would succeed in pacifying the country.

The question of the occupation of Persian territory by Turkey opened a new phase in the affair. If no understanding were arrived at by the mixed Frontier Commission now sitting in Constantinople the question would be decided by the Hague Tribunal.

(THE "TIMES")

The leading newspapers find fault with the Foreign Minister's excessive optimism in his declaration of policy in the Duma. The Novoe Vremya accuses him of undue submissiveness to English dictation in Persia and exaggerated tenderness towards Italy.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, April 28.

After repeated denials that such was its intention, the Government has begun a series of senseless arrests of members of the late Mejlis and other constitutional leaders. Yesterday Sardar Mohi was arrested and exiled to Kashan and four ex-Deputies met with a similar fate. To-day police surround the house of Wahid-ul-Mulk, one of the most distinguished Deputies and formerly Persian lecturer at Cambridge University, and the arrest is contemplated of Hussein Kuli Khan, ex-Foreign Minister, well known for many years at the Persian Legation in London. His brother is Oriental Secretary at the British Legation.

As no agitation is in progress the arrests appear to be due to personal vindictiveness, though many believe also that the Regent is continually obsessed with the idea of plots against his life. This obsession has been the cause of the constant desire to escape to Europe which he has shown from the first moment of his return here.

The Bakhtiaris, who claim the town of Shuster as being within their sphere of influence, are in conflict with the Sheikh of Mohammariah.

Teheran, April 30.

The Regent has addressed a letter to the Ministers, urging the necessity of making some arrangements for the elections before his departure for Europe, which is proposed for May 15. Considerable incredulity prevails, however, concerning the Government's intention to summon any Mejlis, but some believe that the imprisonment of all the advanced members of the late Assembly indicates a genuine intention to hold elections for a new Assembly, which after this precaution will naturally contain only moderate members. A separate project is also under consideration for an Advisory Council to assist the Cabinet, consisting of notables and European officials.

Serious disorders have broken out at Kerman, where the anti Government party are threatening the town and are likely to obtain possession of it.

April 29.

Numerous persons continue to be arrested, including Prince Suleiman Mirza, leader of the "Democratic" Party in the late Mejlis, who since the dissolution has devoted himself to educational work and has established a school. Wahid-ul-Mulk was arrested late last night, but has since been released on undertaking to leave the country within a week.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

In a message from Teheran, Reuter's correspondent says that further arrests of members of the Democratic party were made yesterday, including two Tabriz deputies. The chief of police also handed a passport to Hussain Kuli Khan, thus intimating the Government's desire that he should leave Persia. Wahid-ul-Mulk was arrested last night, but afterwards liberated on condition that he leaves for Europe.

A later message says:—"Sixteen persons have already been arrested in pursuance of the Government's plan to get its opponents out of the way. The Government's action is interpreted in some quarters as indicating a desire on its part to prepare the way for the election of a pliant Mejlis."

Hussain Kuli Khan is one of the best-known and staunchest Persian patriots. He was educated in England and was long attached to the Persian Embassy in London. He was Minister of Foreign Affairs in August and September, 1909, immediately after the fall of the late Shah, and again from July to December, 1910. On the latter occasion he resigned largely because of the protection which the Russians afforded to notorious outlaws and of their failure to withdraw the troops which they then had in Azerbaijan.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, May 1.

Salar-ed-Dowleh, brother of the ex Shah, has sent a telegram to the citizens of Hamadan stating that the Vali of Pushti Kuh has sworn allegiance to him and requesting the citizens to prepare to receive "His Majesty." Prince Firman Firma is said to have left Hamadan to-day to advance against him. Prince Firman Firma's force, about 1,200 strong, will be supported on the left from Sultanabad by 200 Armenian fedais sent out by Yezrein and on the right from Zenjan by Bakhtiaris. These latter are also intended to check the advance of Mujall-el-Sultan from Gerus. Mujall-el-Sultan, a former agent of the ex-Shah, now supports Salar-ed-Dowleh, and has advanced within 12 farsakhs (about 50 miles) of Hamadan.

The Regent's electoral rescript appears to contemplate only the election of Deputies in the district of Teheran and the peaceful provinces. It is estimated that the new Majlis will be much smaller than the last. The ultimate formation of a Second Chamber is also much discussed. A senate is provided for in the Constitution, but has hitherto never been elected.

Both the Bakhtiaris in the neighbourhood of Sluster and the Sheikh of Mohammerah have sent telegrams professing complete submission and loyalty to the Government. There is therefore some prospect that their difference will be composed. The Government is, of course, a Bakhtiari Government, Sam-Sam-es Sultanch being Premier and Sardar Mohtashem Minister of War.

The Proposed Indo-Persian Railway.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

A RECENT telegram from St. Petersburg has announced the definite formation of an Anglo-Franco-Russian "Société d'Etudes" for the projected Indo-Persian Railway, with permanent head quarters at Paris, and a meeting of the promoters of the railway was held in Paris last week, at which the articles of agreement were definitely drawn up. This step marks an important stage in the development of a scheme of far-reaching and disastrous import to British and Indian interests. A short time ago the negotiations between the parties were broken off owing to the attitude of the British group on the question of the precise route of the line. The fact, then, that the Société d'Etudes has at last been formed would seem to imply that the question of the route has also been settled, and that takes us a pretty long way towards the ultimate realisation of a scheme of whose very existence most people in England are unaware, which has never been explained in Parliament, and for which our Foreign Office, though Sir Edward Grey has admitted that it has given its assent in principle, has never offered any sort of reasoned justification.

It is proposed that the line shall begin at the Russian port of Baku, on the Caspian Sea, joining there the Russian trans-continental system of railways, skirt the Caspian along the Persian shore to Reest, and thence proceed through Kazvin to Teheran, the capital, then it would strike almost due south to Ispahan, on the border of the Russian zone, cross the neutral zone to Kerman, in the British sphere, and thence join Chahbar, on the coast, and also in the British sphere, either by direct route, as the Russians originally proposed, or via Bunder Abbas, along the coast, as the Indian Government prefers; from Chahbar it would again run along the coast, through the British Protectorate of Baluchistan, to the Indian railhead at Karachi. By proposing that the line should come down from Kerman to Bunder Abbas and thence run along the coast of the Persian Gulf under the muzzle of British naval guns the Indian Government hopes to make the control of the more important portion of the railway secure against its use by an enemy for military purposes, though obviously this might prove an extremely difficult and, in easily conceivable circumstances, perhaps an impossible task. The Indian Government also proposes that this portion of the line, and if possible also the portion in the neutral zone, should have a different gauge to that of the part controlled by Russia, the break taking place at Kerman—preferably at Ispahan. The line so projected would have a length of some 1,800 miles; it would cost, according to the very moderate estimate of the promoters, over £20,000,000; and it would shorten the journey from London to Bombay from twelve and a half days to seven, at a saving of some 50 per cent. in fares—all undoubted advantages if they did not happen to be purchased by laying open the frontier of India to attack, and involving us in consequence in perpetual alarm and a vast military expenditure.

The numerous schemes for a railway to India which have been projected from the thirteenth of the last century down to our time have all alike been by us strenuously and unhesitatingly opposed and defeated. The first to take anything like substantial shape was hatched in 1839 by a group of Russian financiers enjoying the protection of the Russian Government, among whom we meet M. Homiakoff and M. Palashkovsky, who are among the promoters of the present scheme. The idea was then, as now, to construct railway from the Caspian across Persia to Chahbar, though no further; and so seriously was it entertained that in the following year the Persian Government was induced not only to grant a concession, but also to sign a secret protocol granting Russian subjects the sole right of railway construction in the country. The idea was revived ten years later, when the railway construction monopoly was prolonged till 1910 under the terms of the Russo-Persian Loan Agreement, and almost at the same time a twin scheme was brought forward for the extension of the Merv-Kushk branch of the trans-Caspian railway right across Afghanistan to Quetta. In each case the scheme was strongly opposed in this country, and came to nothing.

It is scarcely necessary to recall the reasons for this opposition to every railway scheme connecting Russia with our Indian Empire, or for bringing her within easier striking distance of it. We have always, and justly, regarded it as the prime principle of our strategy not to allow any powerful State to come near the Indian frontier, and we have sought to bar the road to it by the maintenance of a system of buffer States. It was in order to protect India from possible attack that, at great sacrifice, British policy sought to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire and to close the two straits leading to Constantinople against foreign navies. For the same reason our Foreign Office, though attaching great importance to the shortening of the routes to India, opposed for a considerable time the construction of the Suez Canal by the French, and seized the first opportunity to obtain a predominant control of this highway by buying up a considerable portion of the shares; and it was the same insistent anxiety which led ultimately to the occupation of Egypt itself. The same reason prompted our Foreign Office to insist on the independence and the integrity of the Persian kingdom as far back as 1834, and to maintain a similar protective attitude towards Afghanistan from at least the early sixties of the last century.

When Russia, having recovered herself after the Crimean War, found the road to Constantinople completely barred and locked, and turned her attention to Central Asia, attacking the Amir of Bokhara, we at once took alarm in view of the proximity of the Afghan frontier, and only acquiesced in the forward march of the Russian troops after Prince Gortchakoff had assured us that the object of the campaign was not conquest, but the pacification of the troublesome frontier tribes. Again, in 1872, when General Kaufmann invaded the Khanate of Khiva, we demanded an explanation from the Russian Government, and only abstained from intervention after effecting a delimitation of the Afghan frontier by which Russia was excluded from the Penjdeh oasis and the Sarakhs fortress. In 1884, however, Russia revived her claims on Penjdeh, and we nearly went to war with her over it. Ultimately we had to yield the point, and Russia advanced the railhead of her Caspian line to Kushk, within 53 miles of Herat. Shortly afterwards Russia brought forward a claim to the Pamir plateau close upon the Chitral frontier, and again we nearly went to war with her in order to preserve that portion of the Afghan State. The advance of the Caspian railway from Merv to Kushk, on the remote north-west frontier of Afghanistan, was treated by Lord Midleton (then Mr. Brodrick) as a danger to India, and the proposal to construct a railway through Afghanistan from Kushk to the Indian frontier at Quetta was denounced by Lord Curzon as madness. It was, indeed, an axiom well understood and accepted by everybody that a railway which would enable Russian troops to be transported within three or four days from Moscow to some point near the Indian frontier would not only endanger the safety of our Indian Empire but also cripple our position in Europe. The policy of isolation has not only been continuous, but it has at times (as in the case of the Suez Canal) been pushed to absurd and impossible extremes.

And now, in direct opposition to this long-established policy, we find our Foreign Office actually disposed to consider in the most accommodating spirit a new scheme for a railway not only through Persia to the Gulf, which cannot be permanently opposed, but right through to the Indian frontier. This is a most extraordinary change of front. It cannot be explained by the mere fact of our present and not necessarily permanent friendship with Russia. If, however, it be not friendship which has inspired our Foreign Office with a new confidence in Russia, what else is it? A reference to dates will perhaps throw some light upon this strange phenomenon. The scheme was launched into the world on 13th November 1910, and just a week earlier an agreement had been arrived at by Russia and Germany during the famous interview at Potsdam, whereby the former Power pledged herself to construct a line from Teheran to Khanikin, on the Turco-Persian frontier, there to join a branch of the German Baghdad railway. Can it have been this scheme, involving, as it was thought to do, a German penetration of Persia, which led to the production of the trans-Persian project? The explanation may indeed appear to be ludicrously inadequate, but if there be any other it is time it were produced.

The Proposed Railway to India.

FOR two generations there have been men, like Mr. Maclean, for example, once member for Cardiff, who have advocated a trans-continental railway to India, but until recently their influence on British policy has been negligible. Then, suddenly and inexplicably, we have begun to hear of a project for building a railway across Persia and Baluchistan to Karachi, and our Foreign Office, instead of examining critically this proposed reversal of Indian frontier policy, has given it benevolent if somewhat detached support. We have no right, said Sir Edward Grey in February last, simply for our own interests, to oppose the policy of railway development. As well say that Englishmen have "no right" to oppose a Channel tunnel. The main object of Indian frontier policy has always been to avoid a coterminous frontier with Russia and the two parties have differed only as to the means to that end. Frontier policy has passed through two stages. There was a time when, in order to save Afghanistan from Russian influence, it was thought by those in power that we ought ourselves to occupy the country. We fought two Afghan wars with that object. But that view was finally abandoned when Lord Hartington, as he then was, announced in 1881 the evacuation of Kandahar. Since then our policy has consistently been to maintain a strong and independent Afghanistan. The only question remaining was whether we should occupy the territory between the administrative Indian frontier and Afghanistan or leave a buffer zone between the two frontiers. The great frontier war of 1896, in which we employed more soldiers than we had done since Waterloo, was fought in order to destroy that zone of independence. At the end of it Lord Curzon, converted by the events of the war, announced his intention of maintaining it. India was thus provided not only with a buffer state between herself and the Russian possessions in Asia, but with an additional buffer between herself and Afghanistan. The triumph of Liberal frontier policy seemed doubly secured. But after it had been accepted by the Conservative Imperialists, it was reserved to a Liberal Government to bring it into jeopardy again. In the interests, real or supposed, of Indian defence, we went twice to war with Persia and twice with Afghanistan. In addition Mr. Gladstone nearly went to war with Russia over Penjdeh in 1884. Later Lord Midleton treated the advance of the railway from Merv to Kushk as a danger to India, and, later still, Lord Curzon denounced a proposal to connect Kushk with Quetta as madness. And now it is proposed quietly, almost surreptitiously, to reverse a policy for which we have fought four wars and were prepared, if necessary, to fight two more. Every objection to absorption of Afghanistan or to railway communication with India across it applies with far greater force to the absorption of Persia and to the proposed Indo-Persian railway. And yet Sir E. Grey says we have "no right" to oppose it.

We publish in another column an article which gathers together the main facts that are known about the new project. The railway is to start at Baku and reach Teheran via Resht, from Teheran it is to go south to Ispahan, and thence, crossing the neutral zone, to enter our "sphere" at Kerman. From Kerman, according to the original scheme, it was to proceed by the most direct route across Baluchistan to Karachi, but, according to an amendment that has been suggested, it is instead to make straight for the sea at Bunder Abbas and from there to India along the coastline. This alternative route was suggested by the Indian Government in order that in the event of war the railway may be under the guns of the fleet. It is further provided that the gauge of the railway should be broken either at Kerman or preferably at Ispahan, where it leaves the Russian "sphere." Both safeguards are illusory. The breaking of gauge might injure the railway commercially, but not as a line of invasion; and if a war broke out the diversion of the railway inland at a few dangerous points would remove it beyond the range of ships' guns. But whose interests is the line intended to serve? Not those of Persia, whose commerce would be equally well served if it stopped at Bunder Abbas and whose people will regard the railway mainly as an instrument of political subjection. It is odd that Sir E. Grey, who is not ordinarily very sensitive about Persian rights, should suddenly become solicitous about her right to have a railway that she does not want. In whose interests, then? So far as commerce goes, there would seem no very obvious gain to a maritime Power in diverting the main line of communication to India from the sea to the land from a route over which we are supreme to one of which Russia has control. Or are the interests served by the line not commercial at all but political? It is significant that the trans-Persian railway project should have come as a sequel to an Agreement which, as it has worked out, is only defended as an alternative to something worse that might have happened without it. But this railway project is an extreme application of the extreme Russian interpretation of that Agreement. Accepting that interpretation as it stands, Russia could not continue the construction of a railway beyond Ispahan. But it is actually proposed that at the point at which her destruction of Persian independence stops we should take up the work and continue it in the South of Persia; and, not content with providing Russia with an instrument of conquest over all Persia, should prolong the railway to India, and so help to make the loss of Persian independence not merely a political danger and disgrace but a direct menace to the safety of the Indian frontier. And yet Sir E. Grey says that we have "no right" to oppose the railway.

No right, he says, in "our own interests alone." But the right to defend India as best we may, even if it is a selfish interest, is not one to be sacrificed in a fit of altruism or of enthusiasm for railways in general. But, unless Liberals have been entirely wrong in their contentions about Afghanistan, the defence of India would be gravely compromised by this railway. India is our only land frontier, Russia is the only Power that can attack it, and however anxious we may be to have Russia's friendship, our frontier defence must assume that Russia may some day be an enemy. When that day comes our position with the railway made will be the same, and worse, as if we had occupied Kandahar and Herat. At the very beginning of a war we should be faced with the alternatives of hasty evacuation or of settling the fate of India hundreds of miles in advance of her natural frontier under conditions the least favourable to ourselves. Bitter experience has convinced both Liberals and Conservatives of the madness of the fight-it-out-on-the-Oxus theory of Indian frontier defence. But even on the Oxus we should be in a far stronger position than at Bunder Abbas or Chahbar. Even if we had to fall back from the Oxus we should still have in front of India impassable mountain chains, peopled by warlike tribes, who would attack the communications of an invading army. But between Persia and India there would be nothing but desert, which we had obligingly furnished with a railway. Either everything that Liberals have ever said and that experience has taught to all of us about Afghanistan is wrong, or this railway across Persia is a danger to our hold upon India in war. Nor would the danger be delayed until the outbreak of war. The mere existence of the railway would commit us to extensive defensive preparation. A new Quetta would arise in Southern Persia, for it is barely thinkable that we should build a railway and abandon it without a blow, and the military burdens of India, great enough as they are, would be increased, to the destruction of all the credit that we might accumulate by wise and enlightened civil administration. Such a revolution in our frontier policy would still be a matter for deep concern, even if it had been long debated and deliberately adopted. But made in silence, without consultation of Parliament or even explanation, it would be a grave default against our interests and the first principles of Government for which no censure could be too strong.—The Manchester Guardian.

The New Persian Literature.

At University College Professor Browne, of Cambridge, crowded into an hour an extraordinarily rich survey of Persian literature during a thousand years. It was a lecture which very few men would have been competent to give, but Mr. Browne is saturated in Persian books and things, and he can quote Persian about as freely as an Ambassador can talk French. The Persian Minister, who was in the chair, said that no one has done more than Professor Browne in the cause of Persian literature. The Persia Society, to whose members he was lecturing, is a non-political society, and the lecturer's well-known sympathies came out chiefly in his interesting account of the new literature that has sprung up from the ferment of the revolution. This is a vein of topical and satirical poetry of which he quoted a delightful example in the shape of a veiled lampoon on the ex-Shah. He saw in this phase a sign that Persian literature is not an affair of dead classics, but a living, self-adapting literature springing from among the people—unlike the comparable outburst in Turkey, which is largely stimulated from outside. He saw it, too, hope that the strong national spirit of the Persians will emerge and survive the misfortunes of the present, and he showed how in the past the country, often overwhelmed, has always struggled free again, helped by the extreme stability of the Persian character and language. "Persian literature to-day is as good as ever it was." Many new newspapers written in admirable style have come into being since 1906. Another interesting point was his discussion of the causes of the popularity here of Omar Khayyam, whom the Persians regard, it appears, as one of the lesser poets. He did full justice, of course, to the transmuting magic of Fitz-Gerald, but he said that some of the finest Persian poetry depends so intimately upon rhetorical and verbal devices that it is almost untranslatable. He corrected the common mistake "that Fitz-Gerald wrote it all." The translation is faithful, but the quatrains were selected and transposed by the translator so as to make a continuous poem. What Omar Khayyam wrote was a series of isolated quatrains.—The Manchester Guardian.

Persian M.P. in London.

("P.M.G." Special.)

M. Haji Vakil-ul-Rouza, a prominent member of the last Majlis who is now visiting London, replied in an interview with a representative of the Pall Mall Gazette, to the criticisms of Persia's aptitude for Constitutional Government.

Considering the short time they have had and the way in which their work has been hampered, he considers that they have done a great deal and that the criticisms are unjust. "First of all," he said, "the Mejliss dealt with the financial situation. At a time when there was not a penny in the Exchequer, it found the money for sending expeditions against the various rebels and it succeeded in quelling the disturbances."

"The Ministry of Finance was reformed completely. Persia's loans with the Imperial Bank of Persia and the Russian Bank were consolidated. The interests were reduced and a new loan was contracted on favourable terms with the Imperial Bank of Persia. Unfortunately almost the whole of the proceeds of that loan had to be spent on the expedition against the ex-Shah."

"It is most unjust to say that any money was wasted. There was never sufficient money to meet the necessary expenditure for the various expeditions and military measures that had to be taken. As a matter of fact, members of the Cabinet met the loss out of their own pockets. As a member of the Financial Committee, connected with all the financial transactions of the Persian Government, I am in a position to speak with knowledge and authority, and I am prepared whilst in London to answer fully any questions on this point."

"People in Europe have the impression that because Persia is an Oriental country, it has no capacity for Constitutional Government, and many of our acts and speeches are misinterpreted."

"For instance, when, in the debate on electoral reform I made a speech in favour of woman suffrage, the reports reached the British Press in a humorous shape. It was said that the question was asked, 'How can women have a vote seeing that they have no soul?' No such remark was made. What was said was that women's rights ought to be protected by men, and that, in a Moslem country, women are not yet in a position to have votes."

"The Mejliss has also been attacked because of the disorder in the southern part of the country and the injury to British trade. As a matter of fact however, British trade in Southern Persia has been increasing, whilst that of Russia in the north has decreased."

"Anglo-Indian trade in the south rose from approximately three millions and a half sterling in 1910 (184,898,948 kranis) to four millions and a half (227,078,000 kranis) last year, whilst Russian trade in the north decreased in that same period from nine millions and three-quarters (489,104,044 kranis) to nine millions and a half (481,785,342 kranis). There has also been enormous loss of life in the northern part of the country during the past two years. We do not deny that the condition of the south is unsatisfactory, but the Government has done all that was possible in the circumstances in spite of the difficulties that claimed its attention in other directions."

"Anxiety as to the future is groundless. Effective measures have been taken by the Persian Government. The gendarmerie, under the Swedish officers, has already done useful work. M. Peterson, one of the Swedish officers, is in Shiraz, where he is busy organizing a force of gendarmerie and establishing a college for the training of officers."

"Three other Swedish officers, with ten Persian officers, whom they have themselves trained, have also arrived in Shiraz with three hundred gendarmes. The Persian Government has also decided to send one of the Swedish officers to Bushire to form a force of gendarmerie there for the Gulf ports. Recently the Government has purchased in Europe a quantity of arms and ammunition, the greater part of which will be sent to Bushire and Shiraz for the gendarmerie."

Morocco.

News of the Week.

THE anti-French feeling here is increasing, and is aggravated by the infliction of a fine of one million francs, on the city of Fez on account of the recent rising there, although the behaviour of the inhabitants of the city was generally excellent during the Mutiny.

According to the Times message from Tangier, the edict inflicting a fine of a million francs on the city of Fez on account of the recent rising there, has been withdrawn. It is officially stated that the publication of the matter was premature.

Reuter wires from Mogador.—The tribesmen of Sus and Aglo districts have proclaimed Makinin as the Sultan of Sus District. The movement is anti-French and is supported by influential Kaids.

Reports from Fez indicate that the situation is becoming worse and that an attack on the city is expected at any moment. The execution of those sentenced by Court-Martial in connection with the recent riots has been postponed for fear of disorders.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST'S" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, April 26.

THE Temps publishes a Fez telegram of to-day's date reporting that several persons whose participation in the Fez disorders had been proved have already been shot. The gates of the town are being guarded by French troops and the native Governors of Fez, Jedid and Fez Bali are being held responsible for the maintenance of order. It seems certain that the tribes in the neighbourhood of Fez were on the point of rising, and that their plan was only foiled by the speed and determination with which the French military measures were carried out. The more distant tribes are hesitating as to their attitude and some of them are being incited to revolt by bands of armed deserters.

A body of 178 Shereefian horsemen forming the Tabor of Captain Vary at Arbana, have deserted with their arms and horses, though without attacking their European officers. It appears that they deserted on the arrival of French reinforcements at Suk el Arba, where Lieutenant Thiriet is encamped with the Shereefian infantry. The infantry had shown signs of disaffection, but according to native reports it did not follow the example of the cavalry.

It is announced at the Ministry of War that up to the present no reinforcements are under orders for Morocco, but the possibility of reinforcements being required is under consideration and definite instructions have been sent to the various bodies of troops which might be called upon. It is believed that important decisions with regard to Morocco will be taken at to-morrow's Ministerial Council.

Madrid, April 26.

According to a Melilla telegram the Harka has been considerably reinforced, and all the prominent Moors of the Rif have resolved to attend a meeting, which will take place in Taza, to agree on the means to be employed to stop the advance of the French troops. The Spanish garrison of Alcazarquivir has been reinforced with 400 men, and according to an official telegram the French positions near Alcazarquivir have been attacked by Moroccans.

(FROM THE "MORNING LEADER'S" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Madrid, April 25.

The General commanding at Melilla telegraphs that the recent revolt in Fez is reaching the Spanish zone of influence. It is thought probable that the rebels will incite the Kabyles to attack the Spanish garrison.

On Monday night fires were noticed on Mount Taza—a calling together of the tribes. Great unrest prevails around Muluya, and it is known that several of the most troublesome chieftains are banding together.

In the Rif country the well-known rebel leader El-Mizzian is preaching a holy war.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, April 26.

The Fez mutiny and the desertion of a squadron of Shereefian cavalry at Suk-el-Arba make the problem of the immediate measures of pacification and the future organization of the French protectorate a leading subject of discussion in the Press. It is believed that these questions will chiefly occupy the Ministerial Council, which meets to-morrow at Rambouillet under the presidency of M. Bailleres. The Journal des Debats, which has always advocated a cautious policy, remarks that "Morocco is not like Tunis, which had a kind of unity and where nearly the whole country obeyed a Government which was relatively of an ordered type. Morocco is an artichoke which must be eaten leaf by leaf."

Ambitious projects for the immediate occupation or subjection of the country between the Algerian frontier and Taza (on the way to Fez) are condemned as being more likely to provoke fresh hostilities on the part of the tribes than to promote the pacification of the country. It is pointed out that there is at present no railway either from the Algerian frontier to the river Muluya or from the sea to Fez so that the question of supplies would be well-nigh insoluble. To attempt at present to establish a line of occupation between Algeria and the Atlantic would be to create a long chain of isolated posts which it would be difficult to defend. As an eminent French soldier recently said, "Let us take care not to occupy fresh territory before we are in a position to administer it." The French public are believed to be too apt to suppose that everything is settled once the initial military difficulties have been overcome. They are reminded that France will have her hands full when she proceeds to enforce some measure of law and order in the regions which she already occupies—the Shawia, Rabat, Fez, and the north-western part of Morocco up to the Spanish zone. The gradual arrival of European immigrants bent upon developing the natural resources of these regions will make it incumbent upon the French authorities to see to it that the protectorate is made effective within this limited sphere

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, April 26.

News received to-night reports a serious agitation in the Gharb districts to the south of Alcazar. When the Sherrefian cavalry deserted from the French camp at Suk-el Arba, as reported in my telegram of yesterday, the infantry, who remained loyal, opened fire upon the mutineers, who, nevertheless, succeeded in getting away with all their arms, ammunition and baggage. They proceeded in the direction of Wazan, always the centre of discontent, and situated amongst the mountain tribes. It appears that on the way to Wazan they were fired on by the tribesmen of the district, who believed them to be loyal troops, and who only allowed them to pass when they were known to be mutineers.

Letters from Wazan report that all the surrounding tribes have been tampered with by messengers from influential personages at Fez, who urge them to exterminate the French. It is feared that the arrival of the 175 deserting cavalry from Suk-el Arba may stir up the mountaineers to action. Meanwhile reinforcements of Algerian Tirailleurs have arrived in camp at Suk el Arba, where the situation was critical.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, April 28

General Lyautey, Commander of the Tenth Army Corps at Rennes and former French High Commissioner on the Algero-Moroccan frontier, has been appointed the first French Resident-General in Morocco. This decision was taken at yesterday's Ministerial Council under the Presidency of M. Fallieres at Rainbouillet. General Lyautey had a long interview with the Prime Minister, M. Poincare, and the Minister of War, M. Millerand, this afternoon at Versailles.

General Lyautey will be assisted by M. Gaillard, the present French Consul at Fez, who is to be appointed Secretary-General to the Residency. M. Regnault, the French Minister to Morocco, who, as Special Envoy to Fez, recently obtained the Sultan's signature to the Protectorate Treaty, will be appointed to a Legation in Europe.

The new Resident-General will be placed under the direct control of the Foreign Office. In order to mark the importance of the Protectorate régime the charge of Moroccan affairs will be vested in a separate department at the Quai d'Orsay. As the number of departments at the Foreign Office has been fixed at 12 by the decree of 1910, M. Poincare has decided that the so-called "Press Bureau," which has hitherto formed a separate department, shall be reduced to the rank of a sub-department of the Political Section. Emoluments on the scale payable to a chief department have thus become available for the new Moroccan Bureau without any increase in the Foreign Office vote. M. Chassain de Marilly, who now directs the sub-department for Morocco, will remain in charge of Moroccan affairs. M. Georges Cluchant, who succeeded M. Maurice Herbet at the head of the Press Bureau, is to be appointed First Secretary at Munich, and M. Jules Mancini, who has had nearly six years' experience of the Press Bureau, is to be placed in charge of the Press service.

General Lyautey was born at Nancy in 1854, and his services will therefore be available for another seven or eight years before he reaches the age limit. Mention has repeatedly been made of his brilliant records as cavalry officer at home, and as a soldier and administrator in the French colonies. In Indo-China, nearly twenty years ago, he was attached to General Gallieni, under whom he continued to serve in the Madagascar campaign. After an interval, during which he commanded the XIVth Hussars at Alençon, and subsequently acted as temporary Brigadier-General in Algeria, he was appointed to the command of the Oran division, and, in 1903, he received the title of High Commissioner on the Algero-Moroccan frontier. His conduct of the campaign against the Beni Snassen and his handling of frontier problems during his three years' tenure of this difficult post won for him golden opinions. General D'Auade whose operations at Casablanca in 1907 remain equally memorable is said to have expressed the view that no better man than General Lyautey could possibly be found to represent France at Fez under the new régime. General Lyautey, who is the author of an interesting treatise on "Le rôle social de l'officier," "Le rôle colonial de l'Armée," and similar topics, is regarded as a future Academician.

M. François Gaillard, the new Secretary-General to the Residency, has been Consul at Fez since the Algéciras Conference, at which he was present as Attaché to the French delegation. His whole official career, which began as Consular probationer at Tanger in 1895, has been passed in Morocco. Few Frenchmen know Fez and the ways of the Maghzen better than he. During the siege of the capital last year he behaved with gallantry and discretion, and his more recent services have been rewarded by promotion to the rank of Officer of the Legion of Honour.

In a preamble to the decree appointing General Lyautey Resident-General, the Prime Minister recalls the events which have led up to the establishment of the French Protectorate and the circumstances in which the recent mutiny broke out at Fez. In order to secure unity of action all civil and military power is to be vested in a single representative, in whom the Government can place entire confidence. These powers are to be exercised under the sovereignty of the Sultan in the interests of the French Protectorate and with due regard for the treaty rights of other Powers, especially as regards the principle of economic equality. In assigning this task to General Lyautey the Government points out that France's civilizing mission in Morocco cannot be carried out until the ground has been methodically prepared by the pacification of the country. The new Resident-General's record as soldier and administrator is regarded as a guarantee that the tribes will be induced to acquiesce in the French protectorate by the enforcement of well-considered measures in political, economic, and military spheres.

In addition to the terms of General Lyautey's commission there will be published in the course of the next few days an official memorandum dealing with the organization of the French Protectorate. This scheme will likewise be promulgated in the form of a decree.

Public opinion has unreservedly ratified the Government's action in designating General Lyautey, and the greatest possible satisfaction is expressed at the fact that a soldier has been appointed to discharge the difficult duties of first French Resident-General in Morocco. The recent mutiny at Fez has unquestionably silenced in advance the criticism which might otherwise have been directed against what, in view of the history of the French Protectorate in Tunis, can only be described as a departure from Republican precedents.

In response to the Prime Minister's request for a report on the causes of the Fez mutiny on the 17th instant, M. Regnault has telegraphed that the outbreak was due to the reduction of the pay of the Sherrefian troops in connexion with the establishment of canteens. M. Regnault states that there was nothing to indicate that these troops were discontented. No general significance was attached to an isolated attack some weeks ago on one of the French instructors at Fez. Indeed, the troops wanted to lynch the perpetrator of the outrage. The men have repeatedly shown perfect obedience under French discipline. No Sherrefian official is charged with having failed in his duty, with the sole exception of the Allaf (the native commissariat officer) and his secretary. An inquiry has been instituted regarding this official's conduct.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A correspondent lately returned from Morocco gives me the following explanation to account for the massacre of Jews by the Moors at Fez. The Jews in Morocco, he says, are obliged to live in a quarter apart, are not allowed to wear hats or boots, and have to be servile in the presence of Moors. The Jews kept these regulations carefully, and the Moors never found it expedient to interfere with them. When, however, the French entered Fez last summer the Jews in the mella threw off all their restrictions. European hats, patent leather shoes, saddles, all appeared as if by magic. The conditional servility was thrown to the winds. The Moors were powerless to do anything. There were 2,000 French soldiers at the gates. But they observed, and laid up a harvest for the Jews to be reaped at some later date. Thus it was that the mutiny against the French officers at the beginning of this month was accompanied by the first massacre that ever took place in the Jewish quarter in Fez. My correspondent declares that the number killed was over a thousand.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST'S" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 1.

Reports from Fez state that the situation is calm, though a number of the mutineers are still at large in the country. With regard to the proclamation of the state of siege, the Temps states to-night that no protest was made by the German, Austro-Hungarian, and Spanish Consuls. They merely took note of the proclamation and reserved to themselves the right of consulting their Governments on the matter.

The two cruisers which, as stated in my despatch of last night, left for Morocco yesterday, will remain off Tangier in order to calm the uneasiness of the foreign colonies in the town, which had been alarmed by the latest news from the Gharb.

(FROM THE "BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.")

According to a telegram received in an official quarter here from Paris, the Ambassadors in that capital of Italy, Germany, and Austria-Hungary, while taking formal note of the proclamation of a state of siege in Fez, have lodged a protest against that step on the ground that it might restrict the rights and safety of foreigners whose affairs compel them to remain in the Moroccan capital. The British and Russian Ambassadors, I am told, readily acknowledged on behalf of their Governments, however, the necessity for the proclamation, and in the answer the French Foreign Minister has returned to the other Powers he has urged that the French authorities may be relied upon not only to respect the rights of foreigners in Morocco, but to safeguard all lives and property.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wired from Constantinople on the 18th instant — The Dardanelles were opened to-day. Steamers are now passing out.

The London branch of the All-India Moslem League has made representations to the Foreign Secretary urging that the extension of hostilities to the Dardanelles and places within reach of Constantinople is calculated to incite the warlike elements in the neighbouring states, and that India should organise a system of volunteering for the assistance of Turkey. It declares that "it will be impossible for our Government to repress the movement on the part of Indian and frontier Mussalmans without the risk of great unpopularity." It points out that the blockade of the Red Sea ports has caused injury which is far greater than usually imagined. Large bodies of pilgrims have been unable to leave Hedjaz for fear of capture and are suffering great distress. The Government is urged to take such steps as it may consider expedient to prevent the further development of a situation prejudicial to the interests of humanity and the progress of the Eastern world.

Reuter wired from Rome — Three Italian columns surrounded the Rhodes garrison in a position in the mountains, the only retreat from which was commanded by the guns of the warships. The Turks lost 83 killed and 26 wounded before they broke and took refuge in the ravines. Italian losses were 4 killed and 26 wounded. The Prime Minister announced in the Chamber, amidst enthusiasm, that the Turkish garrison at Rhodes had surrendered with the honours of war. There is great jubilation in Italy at the surrender of the Rhodes garrison. Signor Giolitti, the Premier, read the despatches in the Chamber of Deputies amid frantic cheering. The papers describe the victory as a defeat of entrenched Turkish regulars, not one gained over the Arab hordes. The press considers the Rhodes success as "one of the most brilliant victories of a glorious war." While occupying Rhodes the Italians took 2,300 prisoners, including 38 officers, 4,000 rifles and four batteries.

An Italian battleship has destroyed the barracks and magazine at Marmaris opposite Rhodes.

The Daily Telegraph, discussing Britain's position in regard to the Turco-Italian war, declares that while Britain is desirous of remaining on friendly terms with Italy, she is bound as a Mahamadan Power to consider the desires of the vast population of India. She cannot, without embarrassment, see the curtailment of Ottoman authority. Britain, the Journal adds, has recently become more popular with Turkey, because it has been felt that she is bound to defend Mahamadan interests.

Reuter wired from Constantinople:—A special council of Ministers has decided upon the expulsion of all Italians from the Empire with the exception of workmen, indigent persons and widows within a fortnight.

Reuter wired from Rome — The main part of the new fort of Tobruk is now complete. Guns and a permanent garrison will shortly be installed.

The Italians have captured the Island of Cos.

The Italian Commanders have informed the inhabitants of the Islands in the Aegean now occupied by the Italian troops that the Islands will not be re-occupied by Turks at any rate not on the same conditions as before.

A message to the Times states that Great Britain has acceded to the request of Turkey to appoint five English officers for the reorganisation of the Gendarmerie in European Turkey.

In spite of exemptions which include workmen on certain trades, it is estimated that the expulsion of Italians from Turkey will affect at least 16,000 persons.

The King of Italy has presented Signor Giolitti, Premier, with £4,000 for relief of Italians expelled from Turkey.

Reuter wired from Paris on the 22nd instant:—M. Izvolsky, Russian Ambassador, speaking before the Russian Chamber of Commerce, said that the French and Russian Governments were making efforts to settle the Turco-Italian conflict. They were in complete harmony with Great Britain, the friend of both France and Russia.

News by the English Mail.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin.

THE Los Angeles publishes a letter from Enver Bey painting the position of himself and the Turkish army in the rosier of colours. He says he has telegraphic connections with Egypt and Tunis, but complains that the English are causing him trouble on the Egyptian frontier. He describes decisive victories which he says he has gained over the Italians.

Rome, April 28.

The following semi-official statement is issued here:—

"A wireless telegraphic message has been received from Admiral Presbitero in the cruiser Pisa, stating that in order to enter into complete occupation of the island of Stampalia two companies of Italian troops were landed, with orders to carry by surprise the hills overlooking the town of Livadia and to surround the detachment of Turkish regulars encamped there. The movement was completely successful, and at dawn an envoy was sent to demand the surrender of the Turks. The latter offered no resistance. Military honours were accorded to the small garrison thus captured."

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople.

There is a rumour here that the Italian battleship Re Umberto struck a reef and foundered off Seid-i-Said (in Tripoli, near the Tunis frontier) while the fleet was covering the recent Italian landing in that neighbourhood.

[The Re Umberto is an old ironclad of 14,000 tons, built in 1888.]

(THE "EVENING HERALD.")

It is reported by the Turkish papers that the Italian cruiser Varesse, which was damaged during the bombardment of the Dardanelles, sunk off Moudras. Only the masts remain visible. It is added that the bodies of four Italians were washed ashore at Sed-ul-Bahr.

Reuter's Agency is requested by the Italian Embassy to state that the rumours in circulation to the effect that Italian warships have been sunk or damaged by the Turkish fire during the engagement at the Dardanelles are absolutely devoid of foundation.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople

A list of 75 prominent Italian residents in Constantinople, whose expulsion has been decreed, contains the names of Signor Geerbasso, Councillor of the Italian Embassy, and the two Vice-Consuls, who, with the cognisance of the Porte, remained behind on the outbreak of hostilities to assist the German Embassy in the protection of Italian interests.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 1

During the last 48 hours the attitude of official opinion here towards the opening of the Dardanelles seems to have completely changed. The Tanin this morning published a leading article explaining that the Italian bombardment of the Dardanelles was a last despairing effort to bring about the intervention of the Powers, and admitting that it had been partially successful. The journal continued:—

Russia has shown her claws and Bulgaria and Greece are excited. In each of these three States one hears much of the danger to peace. If peace is endangered these States will endanger it . . . yet we fail to see that the Government has any further interest in keeping the Straits closed. If by doing so it obliges the neutral Powers to protest and finally to intervene it will play the Italian game for them. European intervention cannot assist us, for experience teaches us that such intervention has always been to our detriment.

If the responsibility for the closing of the Dardanelles rests with Italy, the ill-feeling caused by the consequent commercial losses is turning against us . . . Let us leave the Dardanelles open. Any attempt to force a passage will lead to the utter defeat of our enemy. By making the channel open we avoid serious political complications.

The Council of Ministers sat till past 9 o'clock this evening, and after a long debate decided in principle to open the Dardanelles to merchant shipping. The Government, while anxious to avoid political complications, also wishes to inflict the minimum of commercial loss on neutral Powers, whose benevolent attitude is undoubtedly appreciated by all the moderate elements here.

The general feeling in Turkish circles has been against the closing of the Dardanelles. They would have been rather glad than otherwise if the Italians had attempted to force the passage, being convinced that the defences are equal to the task of repelling any attack. On the other hand, from the political point of view the Porte's decision is regarded as statesmanlike and reasonable and deserving of commendation.—Reuter.

Constantinople, April 27.

The anniversary of the Sultan's accession was observed with more than usual display this year. The streets were decked with hunting and enormous crowds proceeded to the Hill of Liberty, where in the afternoon a review of about 25,000 troops of all arms took place in the presence of the Sultan, the Heir Apparent and other Imperial Princes, the Cabinet Ministers, and members of the foreign Diplomatic Body. This evening the city was illuminated and a display of fireworks took place in honour of the day. The new iron bridge connecting Galata with Stambul was publicly inaugurated and a section of the Baghdad Railway in the Adana district was opened to traffic.

The entire Turkish Press to-day publishes patriotic articles dwelling on the importance of the day from the point of view of the consolidation of the Constitutional régime and the manifestation of union and concord which, in the words of the Tanin, "will demonstrate to the world that Ottomans are strong and worthy to live"—Reuter

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, April 29.

Rear-Admiral Williams and most of the members of the British Naval Mission, whose contracts expired recently, left to-night by the Orient express. They were seen off by a large number of Turkish naval officers, by whom they were repeatedly cheered. In spite of many difficulties and of the restriction of its activities caused by the outbreak of the war, the Mission has done much useful work in improving the organization and training of the Ottoman fleet. Its members were received in audience before leaving by the Sultan, who conferred the Order of the Liakat in gold on each of them and presented Admiral Williams with a signed photograph of himself framed in gold. They also received valuable artistic souvenirs from the Ministry of the Marine.

(THE "LEVANT HERALD")

The expeditionary corps sent against Seid Idris, which includes several divisions of regular troops, the forces of Iman Yahia, and the force of volunteers organized by the Emir of Mecca, is reported to have surrounded the Seid's forces at Sabia (Assyr). The Seid's men attempted to retreat towards the west and a severe battle ensued. The Seid is said to have lost 480 men.

The Egyptian papers state that amongst the killed there were fifteen Italian officers, disguised as Arabs, who taught the rebels to handle the guns sent to Idris by the Italians.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Rome, April 30.

The Chamber of Deputies reassembled to-day in rather scanty numbers after its Easter recess. The question of railway finance, which stands first on the order, seems to have lost most of its interest for the Opposition, and the debate on the Commission's report, which threatened at one time to be lively is now likely to be of a most perfunctory kind. Even in the case of the Electoral Reform Bill, interest seems to be waning, and there is every chance that the measure will pass through the Chamber without much hindrance in spite of the large number of Deputies who have declared their intention to speak on the subject. The conduct of the war is still the all-absorbing topic for the Chamber, as for the country at large, but there is little likelihood of the Government's permitting any discussion as yet, and the Chamber seems willing to acquiesce in the policy of silence.

(REUTERS' CORRESPONDENT)

Rome

In an article upon the Russo-Italian war to-day the Tribuna remarks—"It was suspected that Turkey would endeavour to exploit the closing of the Dardanelles by working upon the feelings of certain Powers. The right to force the straits and our capacity to do so form our most potent weapons of offence. By what law can we be deprived of it? The operation of forcing the Dardanelles will be a long and systematic business. The closing of the Dardanelles is a political and diplomatic manoeuvre intended to set Europe against Italy. We think the straits should be reopened, but the Powers should force Turkey to respect the rights of neutrals."

Constantinople, April 28.

Telegrams from Damascus report the practical destruction by fire of the bazaar quarters of the town. The conflagration, which broke out at midnight on Friday, only exhausted itself towards evening yesterday. The branches of the Ottoman Bank and the German Palestine Bank escaped, although at one moment they were seriously threatened. The troops of the garrison worked energetically, but were much handicapped owing to the absence of proper appliances for combating the fire. Several persons were killed and a number injured. The losses are estimated at £2,000,000.—Reuter

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Cairo, April 30.

The action brought by the Government against Mahomed Bey Farid, President of the Nationalist Party, in consequence of a seditious speech delivered by him at the annual meeting of the party at the end of last month, was heard to-day. Farid, who during the preliminary examination some weeks ago, left precipitately for Athens and Constantinople, has not returned. The hearing was, therefore, confined to the case brought by the Government against Aly Bey Fahmy Kamel and Ismail Effendi Hafez, directors of the native journals Al Lewa and Al Alam, respectively, who were accused of complicity, inasmuch as they had published Farid's speech in their journals. All three accused were found guilty. The Court sentenced Mahomed Bey Farid to one year's imprisonment with hard labour and the others to three months' imprisonment. Aly Bey Fahmy Kamel is a brother of the late Mustafa Pasha Kamel, founder of the Nationalist Party, and by means of a school which he directs exerts considerable influence on the youth of Cairo.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Odessa, April 26.

A Greek friend who has just returned from an extended tour in Asia Minor observed to me to-day that the complex situation in the Near East is pregnant of a potential and ultimate danger which, apparently, the presently neutral Powers do not recognise or appreciate, and it is a menace that England more especially can not afford to ignore or regard with complacent indifference. Turkey's ill-treatment, not only by Italy, but by certain Great Powers which have hitherto professed to be her staunch friends and well-wishers, may be pushed beyond the long-suffering patience and endurance of the Moslem people. My informant, who is a native of Asia Minor and a man of keenly observant intelligence, perfectly apprehends the mood and sentiment of the people, and he assured me, with marked gravity of utterance, that the dread Fatma flag may any day, and without warning, be raised in that province and a holy war proclaimed by the hodjas. Once the pent-up frenzy of Moslem exasperation and renaissant religious fanaticism burst forth here or there, it will be beyond the power of the Young Turk régime to extinguish the devastating blaze before a widespread massacre of Christians and Europeans has drenched the country in blood, and, not improbably, entailed such complications as may enkindle another blaze in the Balkans and a European convulsion. My friend is no foolish alarmist. He possesses an intimate knowledge of the present temper and feeling of the people in Asia Minor of whom he speaks, and that province is to-day but a hardly suppressed volcano. The cataclysmic danger he honestly fears is no remote possibility, but an actually existent and ominously menacing eventuality should the "baying of the Turk" be much longer protracted. It goes without saying, as my informant added, that England, as a great Muhammadan Power should, and must, shape her policy in the Near East, at least for some time to come, with a vigilantly alert regard to the danger here briefly stated by an authority whose knowledge and opinion undoubtedly command, or should command, grave attention.

The International Situation.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, April 30.

NOTWITHSTANDING the reassuring declarations of M. Sazonoff in the Duma last Friday and Count Berchtold's pacific statement to the Hungarian Delegations to-day, public opinion in France continues to be inspired by anxieties of various kinds. M. Sazonoff's statement was, indeed, regarded as altogether satisfactory from the essential points of view of the Franco-Russian Alliance. His references to the traditional relations of Russia and Germany are regarded as perfectly correct in substance and in tone. The attitude of Russia towards Germany may sometimes have been misunderstood by a section of the French Press. It is pointed out that there need never be any serious opposition between the two Imperial Governments save in cases where Germany identifies herself with the adversaries of Russia or yields to manifestations of German Chauvinism. The famous Potsdam conversations in the autumn of 1910 need really have had no concern for France, and their import is now better understood.

A subject which affects French preoccupations more closely is that of Russian policy in Asia. The Journal des Débats says that the only danger lies in the possibility that Russia might place excessive reliance upon German assurances regarding European questions, and on the strength of them engage herself too deeply in Asiatic enterprises. It says:—

If ever Russia were to be deeply engaged in the Far East while France was seriously occupied in Morocco, the destinies of the Near East would be settled in a sense inimical both to Russia and to France.

The language held by M. Sazonoff is believed to preclude any such perilous situation, since it shows that he understands this vital question. Russia is determined to maintain a waiting policy in Asia; she is acting in agreement with Great Britain in Persia, and she wishes to remain to all intents and purposes a spectator of what is taking place in China. The exception made with regard to the future régime in Mongolia is regarded as justified by the special circumstances of that region. M. Sazonoff's declarations with regard to eventual mediation by Russia are interpreted as contemplating merely a large measure of autonomy for the Mongols and their emancipation from the excessive burden of Chinese garrisons. Viewed in this aspect, Russian policy appears to be directed towards the establishment of the status quo rather than the introduction of radical changes.

The perils entailed for Europe by an indefinite prolongation of the war between Turkey and Italy are the subject of more anxious preoccupations. M. Sazonoff's declarations regarding the Balkan States and Crete are welcomed as eminently conservative and pacific. His desire that the Powers should exercise every legitimate influence in order to facilitate the restoration of peace is entirely shared in France, but the extreme delicacy of the situation is appreciated, as well as the necessity of eschewing any kind of intervention which might conceivably extend the conflagration instead of extinguishing or limiting it. The Italian operations in the Ægean do not tend to reassure French opinion. The utmost reserve has, so far, been maintained, even after to-day's news of the sinking of the steamer Texas in consequence of a collision with a submarine mine in the Gulf of Smyrna. The Temps confines itself to remarking upon the tendency of Greek sympathies for Italy to cool down in view of the detriment to the Hellenic mercantile marine which must be a consequence of the present uncertainty of navigation in the Ægean and to the Black Sea. There is also believed to be great uneasiness in Greece with regard to the immediate future of the population of the islands in the Ægean. The Greeks feel that their kindred are likely to suffer both in the event of an Italian bombardment and in consequence of the policy of effective occupation which the Turks are already carrying out in Mitylene, Chios, Rhodes, and Samos.

(THE DAILY NEWS.)

During the last few days the responsible Ministers of four Great Powers have made important statements on the international situation—M. Sazonoff to the Duma, Count Berchtold to the Austro-Hungarian Delegations, Herr Kiderlen Waechter to the Budget Committee of the Reichstag, and Mr. Asquith to the House of Commons. One and all agree that the situation is, on the whole, satisfactory, and express an optimism which is entirely welcome though not entirely expected. Only a short time ago the prophets were foretelling serious trouble, the melting of the snows would bring an inevitable rising in Albania, and the war, coupled with the misgovernment of the Committee, would set the Balkans ablaze. Spring is passing, and there is no sign of a rebellion in Macedonia or an adventurous stroke by one or other of the Balkan States. Undoubtedly the secret of the matter is that understanding between Russia and Austria to which M. Sazonoff referred. These two Governments are agreed to maintain the peace of the Balkans, and they have given injunctions to that effect to their client States. If Russia and Austria want peace they are not moved purely by affection for Turkey. Russia and Austria are competitors for the Turkish succession. Whenever they pursue a forward Balkan policy they can hardly escape opposing one another; but at the present time neither Russia nor Austria is in a condition to try conclusions the one with the other, or, indeed, indulge in any large and risky enterprise. The Russian army is still thoroughly disorganized and devoured with corruption, it is no menace to a strong Power or a Foreign Minister with a strong will. Russia has sufficient occupation in absorbing Persia and Mongolia. Austria, again, has internal complications and financial difficulties, and she has not thoroughly digested Bosnia and Herzegovina. Russia and Austria have, therefore, agreed upon the one course that they could agree upon, and which suits the convenience of both—that there shall be no disturbance of the peace in the Near East which they can prevent.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph writing on 1st May said—

Those who know are more and more persuaded here that Russia is privately coming to some understanding with Italy. I am afraid that the repeated denials of any such agreement uttered from St. Petersburg are received with scepticism in Paris. It will, of course, be remembered that it was the Russian Government which took the initiative months ago in consulting the Powers on the question of possible mediation between Turkey and Italy. Any such mediation was stultified from the start by Italy's rash proclamation of the annexation of Tripoli and the ratification of the annexation by Parliament. Mediation, nevertheless, was proposed by Russia. Had it come to anything it could have been only at the expense of Turkey.

It may, perhaps, have escaped the public recollection that at the outset the Russian intention of proposing mediation was strenuously denied. Nevertheless, the proposal was eventually made. Denials of a private understanding between Russia and Italy are now taken with a grain of salt in consequence. I have not yet seen it pointed out that M. Sazonoff's (the Foreign Minister's) recent speech certainly does not remove any existing grounds for believing that such an understanding exists—on the contrary. The secret of the impression produced by that speech upon the French Government has been extraordinarily well kept. Every single French paper of standing has repeated the usual expressions of gratification at the reference in the speech to the Dual Alliance and the Triple Entente. Not one had even hinted till this evening that everything is not for the best in the best possible of diplomatic worlds.

But as a matter of fact the impression produced here by M. Sazonoff's speech was not altogether pleasing. I am letting the cat out of the bag when I say that when the first reports reached here they were read by French diplomacy with some uncomfortable surprise. A couple of hours after the speech was known here diplomatically to whom I talked on the subject confessed that their first impression of it was disagreeable, "but wait until we have the full report" was their consolation. The full report arrived, and the impression was to a great extent confirmed. It would not be fair to repeat all that I was told on the subject, but the gist of it was: "There seems to be a very great deal about Russian friendship with Germany and with Italy in our ally's pronouncement."

There is not the slightest doubt that a private Russo-Italian entente would be unpopular here, both in practice and on principle. At the outset of the Turco-Italian War the French Government and French opinion rather favoured Italy. The Government had, of course, years before, agreed to allow a free hand to Italy in Tripoli. French opinion was at first impressed by the remarkably swift beginning of the Italian campaign, which, indeed, surprised Europe. Since that everyone's estimate of the Italian operations has very much changed.

Via Vienna and Paris comes a strange report sent by the Central News. This is to the effect that the recent assassination of the Prince-Governor of Samos and the present agitation in Cyprus and Crete are the result of a scheme concerted in Rome which aims at the creation of the kingdom in the Archipelago, the crown of which would be offered to the Duke of the Abruzzi.

Such a State would form an outlet for Italian colonisation, and would turn the balance of power in the Mediterranean in favour of Italy.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A most significant if somewhat amusing message is transmitted by the Rome correspondent of the Temps giving the official Italian view on the Dardanelles question. In official Government quarters, the correspondent says, the attitude of the Porte in refusing to reopen the Straits for fear of an attack on the part of the Italian navy is regarded as "specious and insincere." "The Porte," the official voice declares, "as indeed all the other Powers, knows perfectly well that Italy is not contemplating at present forcing the Dardanelles, inasmuch as she has another very definite plan for naval action in the Ægean Sea, which does not at all necessitate her attacking the Dardanelles. The artillery duel which took place on 18th April between the Ottoman forts and the Italian warships was provoked by the fire from the forts, as the Italian fleet had only in view to make a demonstration with a view to inducing the Turkish squadron to come out and fight. Naturally, as the forts were the first to fire, the warships replied, but the forcing of the Straits no more entered the programme of the Italian Admiralty than it does now."

"The Turks in insisting on closing the Straits on the pretext that the Italian fleet may force the passage are simply seeking to embroil Italy with the neutrals, or to obtain from the latter a guarantee that Italy would not enter the Dardanelles. But the Italian Government is not inclined to lend itself to such tactics. . . . And it places all responsibility for closing the Dardanelles and for all the consequences therefrom upon Turkey."

The Dardanelles.

By PERCEVAL LONDON.

We had just missed the early morning pilotage through the Dardanelles and for four or five hours we had been steaming slowly up and down in front of the jaws of the famous strait waiting for the return of the guiding gunboat. There was a strong south-westerly wind blowing sheets of fine spray horizontally off the crests of the waves, and sky and sea alike were grey and troubled by the promise of a storm. In the course of the morning four or five other steamers, chiefly Greek coasting tramps, came up and joined in our chilly patrol. On the northern side of the strait, the white and now deserted lighthouse of Sidd-el-Bahr stood out against the dull ochre of the promontory, and four hundred yards to the east a conspicuous minaret lent a touch of distinction to the little collection of mud hovels and blank-walled houses of the town. It looked innocent enough in all conscience, but we knew that it was the seaward outpost of the fortifications, and we knew, too, that the three-quarters of a mile of chilly, pewter-coloured sea that stretched between Sidd-el-Bahr and Kum Kaleh, on the Asiatic side of the channel, was strewn thickly with mines, through which only a narrow path of safety curved and re-curved under the northern cliffs for fourteen or fifteen miles.

Kum Kaleh lies just within the actual opening, crowding down upon a low spit of land where a break in the southern cape exposed a view of the land behind and allowed a scanty stream or two to find its way through the bunched shingle to the sea. It was curious to look through the ship's glasses at that wide, flat beach, with its few poplars beside the creeks, and realise, as one counted the very stones, that that landingplace was more famous than any other beach in history. Not even the curving sands of Marathon or the shelving reefs of Trafalgar are quite so certain of immortality as that strip of land whereon Agamemnon and Achilles drew up their hollow ships in order, and set out their encampments for the ten long years of the siege of Troy. Here the hardest fighting of all took place; here the dead Greeks were washed to and fro in their bronze armour beside their galleons, until Achilles took fire at the death of Patroclus, rose up from his sulky retreat, and drove the Trojans headlong back to those dull, wrinkled mounds that are all that is now left of Ilium. Well, after many years, there is war again by the banks of the Simois and Scamander.

At last the first of a long line of ships in Indian file, crept out from under the European shore, and as she met the first hard stress of the wind, she quickened her pace with what seemed a visible relief that the journey across such perilous fields had been safely accomplished. One after another they come out, one of them is a sister ship to ours and she runs up a cheerily cynical little message wishing us a happy passage. As soon as the last of them is on her deep sea route, the small ash-grey Turkish gunboat that has been their pilot turns in a slow circle, her scarlet ensign blowing out like a board behind her in the rising gale. The signal "D R U" orders us to fall in astern and follow her. The directions are obeyed with minute care, as may be imagined, and we move into the Dardanelles as delicately as ever did Agag.

The fortifications of the straits are placed on the northern bluffs, though, of course, Kum Kaleh itself is strongly defended. For the present purpose of the Turks the fairway of the straits is naturally mined to the mouth. Only an exiguous channel is left to the north, in order that any ship daring to run the gauntlet, on the strength of stolen information, should be driven to pass beneath their heaviest guns, in just such a position that no adequate fire could possibly be returned. It would be out of the question to do much harm to the Turkish forts in passing, and, short of taking the defences in rear, only a sudden dash could hope to get even a couple of ships of the Italian fleet through the Sea of Marmora. Of course, since the recent bombardment—which was never intended to be a serious operation of war—the whole width of the Dardanelles has been sown with mines and a raid has been made practically impossible.

The Turks have powerful searchlights in position, and are said to have had no fewer than 800 new mines ready for immediate use for precisely such an emergency. Nor is an attack from the land side likely to be attempted. The Turks have hardly cared to conceal their preparations for beating off any landing parties. There are on the European side two places where small streams descend through ravines into the sea and afford the only possible chance of disembarking a few thousand men. These are known as the Domuz and Saghan creeks respectively, and the Turks have made them both practically impregnable. From the height of the deck of our small steamer one could count the muzzles of scores of field guns commanding the beach.

As is natural, the main fortifications of the cliffs above are carefully concealed. Only on the farther bluff of the Saghan Creek, which commands a full ten miles of the Dardanelles, has there been no attempt at masking the guns, though here, too, they seem rather placed there as a decoy than for serious work. The possibility of running the Dardanelles is naturally a common topic of discussion in Constantinople at this time. The best-informed opinion seems to be that, a surprise being out of the question, a hostile fleet would almost certainly lose half its ships in the attempt and that even those which managed to get through would be seriously injured by the plunging fire of the forts through unprotected decks. Moreover, it is asked what possible good could result from the presence of one or two Italian men-of-war in the Sea of Marmora. The Italians do not intend to land one man on the shore and it would be almost puerile to bombard the meaningless and antique defences of Constantinople itself. It is also not forgotten that the Italian ships would be prisoners in the Sea of Marmora for the remainder of the war. Why, then, has Italy bombarded Kum Kaleh?

The answer is simply that Italy has adopted this means as a political rather than a military operation. She knows well enough that no serious attempt upon the Dardanelles is feasible. But something had to be done to terminate a war that has assumed a character of permanence of which Rome never dreamed last autumn. At this moment the Turks are in exactly as strong a position as they were when the first shot was fired. The war has cost them about two million pounds in all. The Italians have spent over forty millions, and there seems a prospect that the same, or a similar relative expenditure, will be continued until Italy cries "Enough."

But that such should be the end of the war is rightly unthinkable from an Italian point of view. There must then be some new strategy to clear up the impasse of this fight between the whale and the elephant—and, be it noted, the position that has been reached is full of significance for Englishmen.

What Italy now intends is that, at any cost to the peace of Europe, the other Powers must be drawn into the struggle. Their commercial interests must, if necessary, be jeopardised by the war's continuance. In particular, Russia must be made to feel that, at least for her if not for others, the free passage of the Dardanelles is an absolute requirement, whatever other nations are doing. In order to draw Russia into the quarrel, Italy has simply taken the only possible action in her power to close the straits logically. Russia should have a bone to pick with Italy rather than with Turkey, for a distinct understanding was arrived at last year that this war should not be prosecuted in the Ægean—But Italy is becoming hard pressed, and at all risks she intends to provoke intervention. Her action in the Dardanelles is a plain challenge to the other Powers, and, on the whole, it is likely to be successful. Nothing is farther from Russia's intention than to provoke an international complication at this moment, but, on the other hand, and for private reasons, she is anxious to pose as the friend—the most valuable friend—of Italy, and she happens to be in a position to bring pressure to bear upon Turkey. That Russia's consent was obtained before the late bombardment of Kum Kaleh, with its necessary result of the closing of the Dardanelles, is, I think, clear. Russia has sought a locus standi in this business for many reasons and her action in concentrating troops near Khoni and Urmiah is probably not unconnected with the apparently futile operations of the Italian fleet in the Ægean.

For at the moment the Turks are not a whit depressed at the thought of the war lasting another three years. In some ways the challenge has been of the utmost service to her. She has had an excuse for putting her military arrangements in order, and she has taken full advantage of it. Nowhere in the world could you see a more satisfactory body of fighting men than Turkey is now turning out daily. They are bullet-headed, healthy, simple-living soldiers, only too anxious to have a chance of vindicating the military strength of Turkey after the long series of injustices which they believe—and, perhaps, from their own standpoint, not without reason—Turkey has had to put up with from Christian Powers during the last few years. It should not be forgotten that the ordinary Turk has not been in the least impressed by the armed display of Italy. He is more apt to notice the facts that, on the one hand, one small, unaided province of his dominion has held a first-rate Christian Power at bay, while, on the other, he has enjoyed the very important advantages that the action of Italy has instantly brought to an end both the trouble he had been having in the Yemen and the doubtful loyalty of the Senussi in Africa. To obtain the latter alone Turkey would probably have been willing to pay seven times the cost of the present war.

To return to the Dardanelles mines for a moment. It is only right that foreigners should know that the strong current of the straits makes it difficult, if not impossible, to prevent the dragging of mines. If in addition to the mines tethered by a sinker, the Turks have released some hundreds of floating mines with a long life, the passage of the Dardanelles will be for some time attended by risks that one would hardly think a merchantman justified in taking, apart from the fact that the friction set up by the strong tide in the straits will in many cases wear through the steel connecting cable of a sinker in a few days.

The impasse of the Turco-Italian War has come to a head with a suddenness that has found Europe unprepared. The closing of the Dardanelles has brought home to almost every country the reality of a struggle that had become to most observers merely a distant and unmeaning parade of arms. Russia has taken the lead in protest, and her special interests justify her in doing so.

A glance at the map is sufficient to explain the importance of the Dardanelles to Russia. Through it ebbs and flows the whole of the trade of her southern "granary" provinces and of the oil-bearing Caucasus; by it alone during these latter months have ships had access to Russian ports: in short, the closing of the Dardanelles is a source of immediate and tangible harm and loss to Russian interests. So much is obvious. Obvious, too, is the fact that besides being a water road to Russian ports, the Dardanelles is the only sea avenue to Constantinople, and the excessively delicate question has arisen whether, and if so, to what extent, a nation, in order to protect herself against military risks, may cause certain harm to neutral Powers. Put in that form the question seems to be covered by an undisputed custom of international law, called the Jus Angarise which permits a belligerent to inflict necessary damage upon the property of neutral, provided—and here is the crux of the problem—that full compensation is afforded given. Unfortunately, the only cases of recent date—the sinking of France to sink British ships in order to defend a French port was admitted in 1870—afford comparatively simple and direct instances of such damage. The Dardanelles issue presents difficulties, first the frail machinery of international law is quite unable to deal with. For Turkey, so far as can be seen at present, will flatly decline to pay compensation and will claim the inherent right of any country to protect itself in its own waters. This raises a far more serious matter.

The first contention of the Ottoman Government is, of course, that, as Turkey owns both sides of a strait rarely more than a mile in width, the Dardanelles form an exclusively Ottoman lake.

It is argued by Turks that they have exactly as much right to close them in time of war as England would have to close the Thames under similar circumstances. I have myself heard Turks of the highest position lay down this principle as a postulate of the most elementary nature. Against this contention, it may, however, be urged that the cases are by no means identical. Whether it is so laid down in treatises upon international law or not, there has arisen in late years a tendency to include among a nation's spheres of interest any necessary avenue to her coasts. If Denmark went to war with Sweden and mined the narrow waters of the Sound between Elsinore and Helsingborg, Russia would speedily have something to say. Perhaps, cynically stated, the ruling aspect of the matter is that no weaker Power may inconvenience a greater Power without paying full compensation, even if the weaker Power is admittedly acting within its rights.

But Turkey is unlikely to admit the duty of making compensation. She may concede that harm is being done to neutrals by her action, but at the same time she brings forward two cogent arguments why she should not pay for it. She contends, first, that the neutrals have had abundant notice of a state of war which might at any moment compel Turkey to close the Dardanelles, and which, as a matter of fact, has been taken into consideration in marine insurance rates for some months; secondly, she urges that if any compensation has to be paid, it should be claimed from Italy rather than from Turkey. The Ottoman Government has been attacked. Its capital is threatened. There is only one efficient way—by closing the Straits—of stopping the danger. The Turks have taken it and cannot be held responsible for any loss to neutrals.

"Softly, softly," replies the other side, "but the Dardanelles are not a Turkish lake. The strait has been extraterritorialised by the treaties of 1841 and 1856, and the very existence of the Ottoman Government in Europe is directly bound up with the clauses of those agreements. Half Europe then combined no more to guarantee the existence of a Muhammadan power upon European territory than to regulate the world's traffic through the Dardanelles. The freedom of the Straits is at least as important to the high contracting parties as the preservation of Turkish authority upon European soil. At the present moment the chief object of the European convention of 1856 is set at naught by the action of Turkey. If she wished to defend Constantinople from outside attack, there were fleets and forts for her purpose. She has not built the one, and the other she knows to be inadequate. But that does not justify her in blocking an internationally guaranteed highway and she must pay the penalty for doing so. It is a pretty quarrel, and will, no doubt, be solved in the ancient and honourable way, by which he who has the power takes, and he who can keeps. But the significance of the present state of affairs does not end here.

I have no hesitation in saying that the entrance to the Dardanelles was bombarded by Italian warships a few days ago with no other purpose than that of dragging the other European Powers into a struggle over which Italy was losing grip and that was rapidly becoming unpopular in every town in the peninsula. At all costs, Italy has to find some way of stopping this futile and expensive struggle. She is stale-mated both on land and sea. At a conservative estimate, the war is costing her a pound for every shilling it costs Turkey, and she knows that therein the inevitable issue of the rash enterprise will be found, if by some means the other Powers could not be drawn into the conflict. Under cover of the dust thus raised Italy might have some chance of retreating without dishonour.

What could she do? The passage of the Dardanelles was the most obvious international necessity which she could threaten. She was herself no party to the treaties of the nineteenth century. On the face of it, it seemed a justifiable operation of war to attempt to seize the entrance to the strait which led to Constantinople. But this was not her real aim. She knew perfectly well that a few shells thrown at Kum Kaleh would cause the immediate release by the Turks of as many mines as would completely block the Dardanelles to all shipping, and thereto she looked for the needed assistance. She had no wish to hold the forts. Nothing was farther from her thoughts than the occupation of even an acre of Turkish territory. All she wanted—and it is the most familiar of all devices in Persia and elsewhere in the East—was that great inconvenience should be caused to other Powers more effective than herself, and she trusted to their appearance in the arena—in which she herself was barely holding her own at great cost—as the means of retiring gracefully from a miserably provoked war.

But international politics are not matters of such simplicity and it may well be asked whether the external Powers that Italy proposed thus to invoke were willing to play their part. Quite frankly, it may be answered that the issues involved by any interference with Turkish affairs are so serious that no Power would have stirred a finger to help Italy in this crisis unless there seemed a chance of thereby advancing another piece on the huge game of European chess that seems to-day to be drawing inevitably to a grim close. Who, then, could be most benefited by a change in the embarrassed but still nominally valid relations between the greater States of Europe? The answer comes pat—Russia, and it is Russia who has acted.

Some two years ago Austria-Hungary slightly upset the balance of the Balkans by annexing in name property that she had already long enjoyed in fact. In itself this was of no very great moment; but its achievement ruffled the guarded calm of the European deep. Russia resented her action. Germany promptly intervened with an ultimatum. Russia, still crippled by internal and external trouble, submitted to Germany. But they knew very little of the long, silent, almost blind purposes of Muscovite policy who could think that there would not be a day of reckoning. Russia, at the present moment, aims simply at the detachment of Italy from the Triple Alliance. I have no space in which to set out the far-reaching results of her success in this endeavour, but it would be a terrible and sufficient revenge for the humiliation then inflicted upon her, and it is one that, whatever new treaties or prolongations of existing treaties are about to be signed, is possible at this moment, more within her power to achieve, than it has been at any other time during the last twenty years.

Italy is now persuaded that it is worth her while to make use of the pressure that Russia, and Russia alone, can bring to bear upon Turkey to put an end to the war. In return, Italy may or may not be willing to relax the ties that bind her to Austria, who, it should never be forgotten, is her bitter and almost traditional foe. Whether this defection be actually within her political horizon or not, we may be perfectly sure that the assent of Russia was obtained before a shot was fired by the Italian squadron outside the mouth of the Dardanelles, and it is in the possible results of this sudden understanding between Italy and Russia that the true significance of the present crisis is to be sought.—The Daily Telegraph.

Undaunted Turks.

Some interesting information with regard to the progress of events in Tripoli has reached London from Mr. Stuart Smallwood, the war correspondent, who has accompanied the Turkish and Arabian forces at Derna and Tobruk. Mr. Smallwood says that the Italians are despised as fighters by the Arabs, who show great contempt for their fire, which in the difficult country is often very badly directed. The Arabs are resolved to fight to a finish even if they, in their own words, are compelled to eat earth and grass. The dress of the Arab troops so closely resembles the ground they crawl over that it is very difficult to see them 300 metres away even from the rear, much more so for the enemy. Great numbers of Arabs are armed with Italian rifles. In attacking they do not fire at long ranges, but creep up to the enemy, and their first shots are probably fired at distances of 300-400 metres, consequently there is very little waste of ammunition with them. The Arabs have again cut off the Italians' water supply in order to induce them to come out and fight, but with no results. All their water, wood and fuel is brought from Italy. Some writing-paper and envelopes captured from the Italians have the motto "Semper Avanti Savoia" (but they don't) under an allegorical, but premature picture of Italy as a woman holding aloft a national flag over a map of Tripoli. The number of the Italian infantry in Benghazi is 25,000, in Tripoli 25,000, in Derna 20,000 and in Tobruk 15,000. There are in addition 23 batteries of artillery. "Enver Bey (who was reported to have died) can, if he likes, make himself a Sultan of the Tripolitans," adds Mr. Smallwood. "I doubt, however, if he is the man to do so, though he does not fail to see his opportunity, I do not think he will use it. He is immensely popular and deeply revered as the representative and son-in-law of the Sultan by the Arabs, who approach his presence as one might that of a king. He has to submit himself to be kissed all over—even when he is out riding or walking. He is determined to stay in Tripoli while the war lasts, and even if Turkey should make peace while the Italians are on Tripolitan soil the conditions of the contract will not prevent him from continuing the war with the Arabs alone."—The Daily Chronicle.

Arab Girls on the Battlefield.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, April 23.

What greatly increases the fierce, fanatical enthusiasm of the Arab warriors in the sandy deserts of Tripoli and Benghazi is the presence of a large number of girls, the so-called "Amariyehs" (Menders), as well as of whole regiments of half-naked valiant Arab boys.

According to the sacred writings of Islam, neither the very old nor the very young must be excluded from warfare, especially when it becomes necessary to meet an infidel invader or when the Muslim faith itself seems in danger. Thus, in the Arab camps of Tripoli and Benghazi there are at present numbers of old men of about 80 years of age and of male children not exceeding the age of eight.

Both of them fight with admirable courage. Many a grey beard has put to utter shame much younger warriors through their exceptional knowledge of war tactics and through their complete disregard of difficulties and dangers. The vehement fanaticism of the old, too, is a most formidable weapon, frequently more deadly than the vigorous courage and endurance of the young.

Every one of the boys has a rifle. It is rather amusing, say, those who have just arrived here from the field of battle, to see such a little fellow carrying in a most warlike spirit his rifle, which is longer by far than himself.

With regard to the "Amariyehs" or Menders, these are young Arab beauties, girls between 16 and 18 years of age. They derive their names from their office. Their duty is to "mend" the courage of the failing, to rebuke the wavering and to inspire the brave. This seems to be an old Arab custom much in vogue in North African districts.

The Menders have also other duties. They bring water to the thirsty into the foremost ranks of the warriors. They help to transfer the wounded to the ambulance hospitals. They snatch the dying from the field of battle that they should not fall into the hands of the enemy.

Many an Amariyeh has fallen a victim to her splendid vocation.

A pathetic story is told of an Amariyeh who had accompanied her lover into the battlefield. Both of them were assigned to a company of warriors near Tripoli. They all swore that they would "tear their hearts out of their bosoms" rather than yield to the "Macaroni." The latter proved, however, much stronger. The Arab fighters fell one by one. The lover of the Amariyeh was mortally wounded. When the girl saw that there was no escape she lay herself alongside his expiring body. She did not commit suicide, but when the enemy came he found the couple dead, entwined in the last desperate embrace of the eternal farewell.

The Problems of Turkey.

THE New Free Press publishes an interview which its Constantinople correspondent had the other day with Husein Hilmi Pasha, formerly Grand Vizier, who no doubt will one day occupy the post once more. Hilmi Pasha had just returned from his European tour, and in reply to the first question as to what his views were on the subject of peace, deliberately declared:—"I can express, with all the necessary reserve fitting every Ottoman, my profound conviction that an honourable peace is impossible to us so long as the efforts at mediation do not start from the abrogation of the Italian decree of annexation. . . . For us," he continued, "there is only one great danger, that we should conclude peace before our military strength has broken down. Then I am convinced—we should lose the twelve million Arabs—not merely those who are defending Tripoli, but all the Muhammadans in North Africa and Arabia. I do not say that they would attack us or even proclaim their independence, but the trust that the Arabs have gained in the power of Turkey, owing to the leadership of our officers, would be gone." In the course of his further remarks on the situation, Hilmi Pasha touched upon the well-known pacific sentiments of Said Pasha, the present Grand Vizier, and on his own candidature for the post. He said:—"Said Pasha has the reputation of being a pacifist. But you can well imagine that his personal views are bound to sink into the background in face of the will of the nation expressed by the majority in Parliament. His well-known remarks about the possibility of concluding peace were presumably only a way of speaking which had better not have been employed, but had, as a matter of fact, nothing to do with the dissolution of the Chamber. For the rest, the Grand Vizier, though physically weak, is mentally and morally perfectly sound, and has no intention of withdrawing. And since there is no personal quarrel between him and the Committee majority he will probably obtain from the new Chamber a vote of confidence, in order, perhaps, then to retire with all honour for reasons of health." As regards himself, Hilmi Pasha said:—"I have since my retirement repeatedly declared to my friend Talaat Bey and others that I would not again accept the post of Grand Vizier for three years. I thus have before me still some eight months. Apart, however, from that, everybody has his views, and my own are this: Our entire foreign policy is inseparably connected with our domestic policy. To me it is an axiom that if we make a good domestic policy, if we reform the Administration, and, above all, further the economic interests of the people, we shall find among the Great Powers only friends, irrespective of whether they belong to the Triple Alliance or the other group. Otherwise the internal confusion will unavoidably create also foreign conflicts. For my part I can at least say that I left to my successor, Hakki Pasha, the country in a state of perfect domestic and foreign peace. There were then no bands in Macedonia, no revolt in Albania, no disturbances in Kurdistan, no rising in the Hauran and no Arabian question in Yemen. On the other hand, I settled foreign conflicts such as the Bosnian and Eastern Rumanian questions which I had taken over from my predecessor. But I have no wish to act once more, as the French say, the part of a gravedigger, and to bury old corpses. At any rate, I should not be able at one plunge to find my way through the acts of the conflict over Tripoli, as Said Pasha has done by means of a daily study of the question, in spite of his illness." Hilmi Pasha concluded by expressing once more his conviction that "the future of constitutional Turkey depends much less on questions of system than upon the fullest possible satisfaction of the economic needs of the people and upon the grappling with every apparently insignificant local question. In this respect," he added, "the successful journey of Hadji Adil Bey, the Minister of the Interior, is a good omen. Of what use, for instance, to an Albanian is constitutional freedom of speech, which he does not understand, though he has always had it? But secure to him regular work, regular earnings and a piece of land which would free him from misery and idleness, and he will become the quietest and most loyal citizen of the Empire."—The Manchester Guardian

The Italian Plan of Operations.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Italian Government continues to regale the European public with grand notions of its forthcoming exploits through the intermediary of the Rome correspondent of the Temps. In his latest message the correspondent somewhat gratuitously reiterates that Italy has no intention whatever at present of forcing the Dardanelles, but is contemplating a different mode of procedure which is certain to bring the Porte to its knees. This procedure consists in occupying a series of islands in the Aegean and in thus interrupting telegraphic communication between the Continent and Asia Minor, to the great damage of the interests and the prestige of Turkey. Moreover, it is the intention of the Italian navy to occupy certain islands in the Archipelago, to bombard the forts, the barracks and the konaks (Government buildings) on the Turkish coast, to suppress all contraband of war, to destroy the Ottoman mercantile marine (?), and so forth. "The application of these rigorous measures against Turkey," the correspondent assures us, "has already begun, and will be continued calmly without haste for days, for weeks, perhaps for months—in fact, so long as may be necessary to bring the Porte to reason. Italy expects to derive therefrom a great advantage both politically—a few shots against the Turks sufficed to bring about at Samos a Hellenic movement—and economically."

The boast, however ill-founded, that it was the Italian action which brought about the assassination of the Prince-Governor of Samos is characteristic of the kind of bravado with which this mouthpiece of the Italian Government is trying to frighten Europe and the Porte. His conclusions, however, are anything but inspiring even from an Italian point of view. "One must be prepared," he says, "to witness a certain relaxation, in view of the heat of the season, in the land operations in Africa. As against this the naval operations are to be conducted with redoubled vigour during spring and summer. In this way Italy expects to finish her enemy methodically and without precipitation. As for the Arabs, Italy is convinced that, firmly as she is established on the Libyan coast, she will gradually overcome their resistance by a colonial war, which may perhaps last long but of which the outcome is assured in advance."

From Balance of Power to Concert?

THE Europe of sixty years ago was startled and faintly amused, when Cavour decided to take his share in the Crimean War. To-day it is an Italian attack which has revived all the dormant perplexities and ambitions which centre in the Dardanelles. Our fathers and our grandfathers would have felt that the first of British Imperial interests was imperilled before ever a shot had been fired at the Straits. It has required a slowly developing object-lesson to revive in us the perceptions which with them had become instinctive. Day by day the fleets of grain-laden ships have gathered beyond the forbidden passage. The captains have had to knock at the doors of the Embassy, and the shippers to remind the Foreign Office that something like seven millions sterling is lying waiting while the Italians perform their meaningless evolutions in front of the Turkish ships. A temporary solution, we suppose, has been reached; and Turkey has been induced to re-open the Dardanelles, no doubt under a guarantee from the Powers that Italy will not be allowed to repeat her senseless exploit. So long as the Dardanelles were exposed to the threat of a forced passage, it was right and inevitable that every step known to science should be taken to make the passage dangerous. If the loss fell on the commerce of Europe, and on the merchants of the City and Odessa, their complaint lay against Italy and not against Turkey.

The closing of the Straits has been a temporary incident in this monstrous war. But it is probable enough that it may serve to bring the whole dispute at last within the purview of the Concert's diplomacy. A discussion in which the future of the Straits is involved is precisely what Russia has desired ever since M. Isvolsky first proposed a Conference to regulate the Bosnian affair. The universal benevolence of the speech on foreign affairs which M. Sazonoff delivered to the Duma at the end of last week may, indeed, be a conscious prelude to an embarrassing demand. The Russian Foreign Minister laboured through a series of paragraphs to emphasise the intimacy of his affection for every Power in turn, and his references to Germany and Italy were, if possible, more cordial and certainly more emphatic than the assurances which he addressed to France and to ourselves. Was he addressing, in anticipation, a Council Board from which he will presently ask the opening of the Straits to the Russian fleet? That is a matter of speculation, but of the many anxious aspects of this Italian war, not the least disquieting is the close association which has declared itself between St. Petersburg and Rome. Russia seems in this conflict to be the Tertius Gaudens, and if her repeated efforts to rob the Turks prematurely of some of the fruits of their obstinate defence should eventually succeed one may be sure that she will claim her commission on the transaction. Italian policy is manifestly directed towards bringing about some mediation favorable to herself. She has realised that the conquest of Tripoli will be an affair of many years. She cannot think that the occupation of the Aegean Isles would seriously embarrass Turkey. But the cutting of cables, and the peril to navigation, illustrated by the rather mysterious disaster to the Texas near Smyrna, are inconveniences which powerfully reinforce the argument from the closing of the Straits, and also illustrate the perils to civilisation arising from a great naval war. There is, as we have urged from the outbreak of the war, a case for the most drastic intervention. The Concert, if it was too weak to prevent the outbreak of the war, ought none the less to have contrived to limit its area to Africa. If it allows itself at last to act in response to these recent Italian provocations, public opinion will expect it to bear in mind that it is dealing with a piratical adventure, and treating with a Power which is palpably unable to make good her own ambitions. To impose any solution which required the Turks to abandon their sovereignty over Tripoli would be to deal a fatal blow to the last vestige of any conception of international right.

The speech of Mr. Sazonoff to the Duma merits, meanwhile, a certain attention. It was a tedious performance which suggests no very notable intellectual equipment in the speaker. It was notable only for the effrontery of its official optimism. It betrayed some gift of subconscious humor in the passage which explained that the Power now engaged in suppressing the national existence of Finland has imposed a quasiprotectorate on Mongolia, because the Chinese are so deplorably lacking in consideration for the national habits of thought of the Mongolians. The promise to withdraw the Russian troops from Persia when the Persian Government is strong enough to assure order, reads like an echo from the 'eighties of our own promises to withdraw from Egypt. The Persian Government has been strong enough to suppress its Parliament, and this week it is arresting deputies and exiling the leaders of the Opposition. Could a Russian Minister ask for more convincing proof that order is restored? But the real significance of the speech lay, to our thinking, in the rather unconventional passage dealing with Anglo-German relations. M. Sazonoff explained that Russia had herself found salvation by the Potsdam bargain, and had thus restored her "traditional friendship" with Germany. He went on to applaud Lord Haldane's tentative in Berlin, and trusted that we, in our turn, would reach an arrangement with Germany. He even spoke of Russia in a phrase which may have meant much or nothing, as a powerful intermediary between Germany and Great Britain. These, no doubt are excellent sentiments. We have no doubt, that they are also sincere. M. Sazonoff is a convinced votary of peace. Has not peace given him Persia and Mongolia? He is equally friendly to Germany and Great Britain, for each in turn has presented Russia with something she desires. From their rivalries he and his predecessors have extracted the reversion of Persia. If he means to-day to assist in a reconciliation, we may be sure that this good office also will be profitable.

It would be foolish to carp at the really excellent advice which M. Sazonoff gave us. We join with him in hoping for the best and largest results from Lord Haldane's mission. The lesson which lies on the surface of his speech is that the elaborate Continental system which M. Delcassé sketched and Sir Edward Grey perfected has crumbled like a house of cards. We set out to restore Russia to her position as a Great Power. We made to her in Asia, on the morrow of her collapse, concessions which would have been generous had she been triumphant. Our aim was to hold her as a weight on our side in the balance of power. At every step in the gradual betrayal of Persia our subservience was explained and defended, because it was necessary to pay this great price in order to have her alliance in our rivalry with Germany. The strangest development of this policy is unquestionably the assent which our Foreign Office has given to the construction of a Russo-Indian Railway through Persia. This departure from every tradition of Anglo-Indian strategy is inexplicable, unless it was a mere retort to the Bagdad Railway. We were nervous at the German approach to the Persian Gulf, and under the influence of that mood we actually sanctioned the building of a Russian road to India. But even as we sought to play off one Power against the other, the whole aspect of the problem changed. Russia, in 1907, seemed to be definitely ranged in the Franco-British camp. To-day she bestrides the line which divides the two European groups. The event has shown the folly of our calculations. The Bosnian crisis, in which, perforce, we allowed Russia to be intimidated by an unanswerable German intervention, was the beginning of the end. Russia had to recognise that she could not face the enmity of a Continental Power, and in due course she went to Potsdam. The Times said of that episode at the time that it was a proof that the Triple Entente had ceased to exist. To-day we have, from M. Sazonoff himself, an admission of the justice of that observation. Of course, the Dual Alliance exists, and the Triple Entente as well. But so also does a Russo-German entente. Russia, in short, has entered what Sir Edward Grey would call "the orbit of German diplomacy." The adventure of the balance of power has ended as it was bound to end. We have discovered that Russia has neither the will to keep her engagements nor the ability to act "a brilliant second" in a European duel. She has at least given us the legacy of her good advice. The signs all are that we intend to follow it, if our Foreign Office has the alidity to cut a path where it sees a goal. —The Nation.

Italy's Difficulties.

By their naval reconnaissance in the Aegean and the exchange of shots with the Turkish forts at the mouth of the Dardanelles, the Italians have acknowledged in effect that they are making no progress with the war in Tripoli, and that they are compelled, in disregard of their self-denying ordinance, to carry the war into European waters. This is exactly the result which those who took a long view of the Italian adventure in Tripoli always feared. What further results will flow from the same impulse to get effectually at the enemy time alone will show. But the systematic reconnoitring of the Italian Navy in the Aegean and the seizure of the island of Stampalia, which is no doubt to serve as a naval base, mark a new phase in the war. And this is true whether we suppose that Italy has decided actively to make war on Turkey elsewhere than in Tripoli, or whether we suppose that she is only uttering a "warning."

The difficulties of making war with Turkey are enormous, as Russia has not yet forgotten, and a frank recognition of them is the only basis on which the Italian Government can think out their future campaign. When most countries are conscious of being in very hot water they are anxious to get out of it even by a movement wanting in dignity. But it has become Turkey's normal occupation to be in hot water. It must not be supposed that because she is distraught she regards that fact as the beginning of the end. She knows from experience that it is not. The anxieties of Turkey cannot be transferred to the account of Italy in the form of a corresponding degree of confidence. The great danger which the Italians ought to avoid is that of entirely reconstructing their plans and substituting for the old ones naval and military enterprises that would most likely be disastrous. The Tripoli campaign so far has merely been disappointing—bitterly disappointing, it is true—but it has not been in any shape or form disastrous. To send the Italian Navy into the Dardanelles and to land a large Italian force in European Turkey or Asia Minor would be to run up against the peculiar natural advantages or latent strength of Turkey. Yet we cannot disguise from ourselves that the Italian Government will be exposed before long to strong and impatient criticism at Home if the war makes no headway, and will be tempted to save its face by some showy adventure. The landing of Italian troops in European Turkey would probably raise the whole Balkan question, as of course there is no State in the south-east of Europe which is not waiting for an opportunity to cut off from Turkey, when she is sufficiently embarrassed, the piece of fat for which it has long been waiting.

The only thing likely to restrain the Italian Government from satisfying by rashness the present enthusiasm for the war in Italy is a proper appreciation of the difficulties of making war with Turkey. The first of Italy's troubles is the unexpected behaviour of the Tripolitan Arabs. The whole Tripolitan coup was based on the assumption that directly the coast towns had been captured the Arabs, more intent on trade than on religion, would throw off any loose allegiance to the Sultan that they might still profess and welcome the Italians as the guarantors of new opportunities of wealth. In the conquest of nations there have been many delusions like that, but none perhaps more complete than the Italian miscalculation. The Turkish garrison and the Arabs of Tripoli and Cyrenica bickered continually before the war, but now they have become friends and comrades in arms under the common pressure from without. Ought, then, the Italians to penetrate into the interior of Tripoli in spite of the opposition and dislike of every Arab, man, woman and child? We believe that tame though a policy of patience must necessarily appear it is the only sound one. A desert campaign which has no objective and which would end in pursuing innumerable small bodies of tribesmen who scatter and form again like mountain mists would be madness, and ruinous madness, too. The chief blunder, no doubt was the formal and premature announcement of the annexation of Tripoli. That infuriated Moslem sentiment of every shade and degree. It would have been much better to prefer the substance to the form, and to have settled down to some such tenure (more or less illogical but perfectly practical) as Great Britain has in Egypt. But it is characteristic of a Latin race that it always wants to occupy a sharply defined and terminologically defensible position. It is useless now to lament this error in political tactics. The Arabs and Turks, who might have been kept apart, are united, and the proper method for Italy remains one of patience. The Arabs may be indifferent now to every Italian bait, but in a few months or years they will feel the inconvenience of having imports shut off from them along the whole littoral. Smuggling there will be, of course, for the Italians cannot possibly prevent it along 1,200 miles of coast, but, all the same, the rifles and other European goods which represent the amenities of Arab life will be irregular in supply and higher in cost. This is not an heroic argument for soldiers to use in prosecuting a war, but it is the only one likely to tell in the long run that would not be exhausting to Italy herself. Of course whenever the Turks or Arabs approach the Italian positions it will be proper to attack them, but we are certain that in all essential respects the right policy of Italy is to "sit tight" in Tripoli and wait for the Arabs to come to them for trade.

Of course if the political disposition of the European States in Europe had been otherwise, Italy would have had a very easy course open to her. She might have landed troops in Albania or in Epirus under cover of her ships' guns. The Albanians probably would have been well enough disposed towards them, and the effect of such an invasion on Turkey would have been very great. Albania is the one part of European Turkey where Italian troops might have landed with a real prospect of influencing the course of the war. A glance at the map will show how simple an expedition would have been from the naval port of Otranto to the Albanian coast. The south east corner of Italy is a perfect base for such operations. We do not say that Italy could have carried the war through Macedonia to the gates of Salonika, which to day has a political prestige equal to that of Constantinople; but the mere occupation of Albania would have been a most powerful lever in her hands. All this was impossible, however, because of the Triple Alliance. Italy had to mould her plans to suit the susceptibilities of Austria. We even suspect that before she declared war she was constrained to give a definite undertaking to Austria that she would not invade Albania. As it is, Italy has to operate in the Aegean, where she is a considerable distance from home, and that is quite another matter. She cannot keep ships there without some apprehension as to what the Turkish Navy may be plotting to do. The obvious remedy is to get rid of the Turkish Navy. But, unfortunately, the Turkish Navy is inside the Dardanelles, and another glance at the map will reveal the terrors of a naval attack in the Dardanelles. Ships that sailed in there would go straight to their doom. The narrow channel is completely controlled by forts. There would be no chance of escape. Even if the fire from the forts were so poor as to miss at short ranges, the channel would no doubt be strewn with mines. The only possible way to seize the Dardanelles would be to land an army near Gallipoli, in the Gulf of Saros, and reduce the Turkish forts singly. Nor would the capture of the Dardanelles, even if it were possible, avail Italy very much. The Turkish trade which passes from the Black Sea or the Sea of Marmora into the Aegean is an insignificant proportion of the whole. Italy would not be crippling Turkey, but provoking other nations by touching their interests. We feel sure that Italy will not try to force the Dardanelles with her ships, and we hope that she will not take the risks of a land war with such excellent natural fighters as the Turks in their own country.

Even when we have reckoned up the obvious advantages of Turkey, other points which make her an extremely awkward customer to wage war with can be mentioned. The Young Turks, for instance, have their back against the wall. They live by prestige alone. It is necessary for them to defend the cause of Islam against a Christian nation with extravagant scrupulousness, or they would suffer from the suspicion, which peculiarly attaches itself to reformers in Turkey, of being lukewarm in the faith. The Young Turks, in brief, cannot afford to yield. Further, we must remember that the war in Tripoli is a very cheap war for Turkey. It may be that in indirect ways it is costing more than the Government thinks; but the expense is not apparent, and the Turks therefore do not feel it acutely. The actual loss in trade through the severance of Tripoli from the Empire is next to nothing. Italy's difficulties are so numerous that we suspect that if the war is seriously carried into Europe or Asia Minor, it will be with the active help of some other Power. We trust that such a dangerous expedient—the long-delayed Balkan scramble would then probably begin—will be avoided. It is a danger, however, and we had better recognize it. Meanwhile we trust that Diplomacy has not said her last word in the way of mediation. We should like nothing better than to see Italy mistress of all her difficulties. In a way her troubles are unnecessary because she and Turkey, apart from Tripoli, have a large measure of common interests. It would be a charming irony indeed if circumstances forced the two countries into a working understanding which had never been contemplated by statesmanship. After all, is the blessed word "Annexation" so essentially blessed? Might not Italy even now give up the "word" if the "thing" were assured to her? The Italians are the most skilful diplomatists in the world. Surely they will not let themselves be injured by the fact that they said too much in their original proclamation!—The Spectator

Why Italy Wants Tripoli.

Signor Crispi's memoirs, published in English in two large volumes, are not very thrilling reading. He tells again, in the first volume, the story of the fight for Italian unity, with the conflicts between Garibaldi and the men of the south, and Cavour, the astute and sanely patriotic Minister of Victor Emmanuel.

The second volume contains the story of the formation of the Triple Alliance. Crispi profoundly mistrusted France. Napoleon III. had been the enemy of unity, and he saw no difference in essentials between him and the statesmen of the Third Republic. The alliance between Italy and Germany and Austria gave his country the international status it needed, and has undoubtedly been of immense importance. It must be remembered that Great Britain in the eighties was closely associated with Germany, and Italy's entrance into the Triple Alliance was welcome in that country.

Recently, largely owing to the policy of M. Delcasse, Italy and France have become friends—but the Triple Alliance still continues.

The most interesting chapters of the memoirs are the last, and they explain Italian ambitions in Tripoli. Signor Crispi wrote to the Italian Ambassador in Berlin on July 18, 1890:—

I must revert to the question of Tunis once more. The occupation of Tunis by the French in 1881 produced the downfall of the Ministry. The country was deeply moribund, but at that time Italy was isolated.

To-day, however, the Triple Alliance exists, and the change of sovereignty in Tunis would produce two consequences—the withdrawal of the present Minister and a general conviction in the minds of the people that the Triple Alliance is of no use.

This second consequence would be fatal, and the Berlin Cabinet must take it into serious consideration.

I am convinced that if Germany will make it understood at Paris that the execution of the treaty of July ninth might lead to war, the government of the Republic will consent to an adjustment with Italy.

Communicate this opinion of mine to the Chancellor of the Empire.

Five days later he wrote to Lord Salisbury, then British Foreign Minister:—

Should this change of denomination in Tunis be allowed to take place against our will and without encountering opposition on our part, Tripoli's turn would soon come. That the Government of the Republic desires to occupy that region is proved beyond doubt by the frontier incursions that are continually taking place.

In this case one Power alone would dominate Northern Africa from Morocco to Egypt, and this Power would control the freedom of the Mediterranean. As for Italy, she would be permanently menaced by France, and Malta and Egypt would not suffice to ensure the position of Great Britain.

In the presence of such peril as this we must prepare ourselves, and prevent the accomplishment of France's plans.

As Tunis cannot be rendered independent and the Protectorate prevented from one day or another becoming a sovereignty, it is of great importance that we provide against such a pation of Tripoli by France by forestalling her in taking possession of that country.

If we held Tripoli, Biserta would cease to be a menace either to Italy or Great Britain.

We are your necessary allies, and our union guarantees your dominion in Malta and Egypt. Thanks to this union Italy would no longer have to fear a double and simultaneous military expedition directed against her from Toulon and Biserta.

Lord Salisbury agreed with the Italian point of view. Catalani, the Chargé d'Affaires in London reported, to Rome a conversation he had with the British Minister on July 31 —

He furthermore made the following declaration:—The occupation of Tripoli by Italy must be accomplished regardless of what may happen in Egypt, that is to say, whether Egypt remain under British control or in the hands of the Sultan. The interests of Europe demand this occupation, that the Mediterranean may be prevented from becoming a French lake. The only point to be further considered is whether the present moment be the best suited for putting this undertaking into execution.

But Lord Salisbury counselled moderation and waiting, and Signor Crispi fell before his ambitions were realised. It is curious to note that he had no fear of Turkish resistance.

Turkey is not strong enough to safeguard the freedom of the Mediterranean. She is incapable of arresting the encroachments on the territory of Tripoli that have been going on for the last nine years along the Tunisian frontier. It is therefore more than probable that she will be unable to offer opposition to the occupation of this region. Owing to her peculiar position, Turkey possesses only "the strength of the weak", she is capable only of sowing dissension among the strong, who are obliged to exercise great forbearance for fear of what may supervene. But this privilege which the Sultan enjoys must not be allowed to constitute a permanent danger to the other states which hold sway in the Mediterranean and whose duty it is to safeguard their own existence there, and maintain their rights inviolate.

As it has happened, it is the Arab tribesmen who are making the Italian occupation of Tripoli difficult and perhaps impossible. Signor Crispi counted on their friendship —

Sid Hassuna Karamanli showed himself disposed to support Italian occupation, he being convinced that if we do not occupy Tripoli, others will speedily do so. He declares he can command all of the hill tribes, as they are all his devoted followers. He asked for time to prepare the ground and for money, not for himself but for the sheikhs. He would be willing to accept a form of government similar to that of Tunis, and declares that by such an arrangement opposition on the part of the Arabs would be avoided and the country pacified. He has no doubt Turkey will resist our advance, but if deprived of the help of the Arabs she will soon yield before the Italian forces. He recommends the utmost caution, as he is closely watched by the Governor-General. He says the country is weary of the Turkish occupation.

The world changes in twenty years. The Arabs may be weary of the Turks still, but a Moslem revival has occurred, and they prefer government by the Crescent to subjection to a Christian Power.—The Daily Express

The Turkish Parties.

THE Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, whose knowledge of Turkish affairs is unrivalled, reviewed the electoral situation in an article which is interesting both from the view it took of the contending parties, and for the general optimism with which it regards the chances of Parliamentary government in Turkey. "The party of Union and Progress," he says, "which regards itself with some justification as the founder of the new political organisation of life, has in the course of the last Parliament kept a firm hold on the reins of power. Sometimes it would succumb to the fierce attack of the Opposition, and sometimes it would itself undertake a cleansing operation among its members. That was natural. It was only by the gradual separation of chaff from the wheat, and through the fire of party discipline that it could at all attain the consciousness of its own worth. It has passed during the four years on which Turkish Parliamentary government now looks back through some exceedingly difficult situations which have severely tried its power and existence. Both domestic and foreign policy have played it some nasty tricks, and have seemed more than once to counteract with its success its endeavours to create a united Ottoman fatherland. These have been for the party years of serious test, from which it now emerges from the electoral campaign hardened and steeled.

"Nothing even approximating this can be said of the parties of the Opposition. One misses here entirely anything resembling a programme. The decentralisation of the Administration, and, together with this, the creation of a sort of Federal State, only serve in the hands of these parties as a bait to catch adherents. There has never been any serious intention on the part of the leaders of these parties to carry out the promises they make. The lack of sincerity which pervades their words could only deceive a few Nationalist hotspurs, while producing in the more serious elements of the Opposition a contrary effect. Both the Liberty and Concord party and the minor groups are utterly bereft of conscientious leaders and faithful followers. Besides, the Opposition has never possessed any organisation. It has latterly devoted most of its strength to personal squabbles, which indeed filled the last two sessions of the Chamber. In the course of the electoral campaign it has lost rather than gained in the matter of organisation. The resignation of Damad Ferid Pasha, the Sultan's son-in-law, from the leadership of the Liberty and Concord party has been a specially hard blow to it. This meant the loss of the most brilliant name on its list. The party also showed a complete misconception of the situation when it tried to exploit for its party purposes the war in Tripoli. This cost its parties some adherents.

"On the other hand, the Committee party, enjoying the support of the Government, has well understood how to make use of the situation in order to extend its organisation to the most distant corners of the Empire. From the point of view of impartiality this action of the Government cannot, of course, be justified, nor can one justify the strengthening of the press law and the arrest of a few hotspurs of the Opposition. The Government and the Committee party, however, declare that, in view of the need for securing the orderly development of government and for counteracting the centrifugal tendencies of the Opposition, the use of the power possessed by them is a matter of urgency and a high patriotic duty."—The Manchester Guardian.

Openings in Turkey.

THE Quarterly Trade Journal of the British Chamber of Commerce of Turkey says "With Turkey undeveloped as it is to-day, Great Britain has a trade of fifteen millions. What will happen when the vast resources and natural wealth of the land, with its million miles of area and its population of twenty-five to thirty millions, are opened up? This consummation may not be immediate, but it is an imminent possibility, and it behoves Great Britain to watch events, lest when the time comes British trade and enterprise should not find itself left in the race, hopelessly out-distanced by its more far-seeing rivals.

"The more alert and attentive capitalists of France and Germany, of Austria and Italy, have already realised that in Turkey there are possibilities to-day which did not exist in the past.

"Dependent as Great Britain is on foreign countries for its food supply, the opening up of Asia Minor and of Mesopotamia and Eastern Syria, the granaries of the Roman Empire, is another point not to be neglected, and, provided that capitalists can obtain the security required to assist in the development of these countries, by railway construction, the making of ports and roads, by irrigation and drainage works, and by the introduction of electric light and traction, will assuredly bring with it reciprocal advantages."—The Near East

Turkish Railways.

M. RAY, Director of the Constantinople-Salonika and Smyrna-Salonika and Smyrna-Cassaba railways, publishes his yearly report, from which we gather that the total length of lines exploited in Turkey in 1909 amounted to 6,228, and in 1910 to 6,332 kilometres. This slight increase in the mileage will be much higher in subsequent years owing to the opening of the Homs-Tripoli, Soria-Panderma, Haba-Eshi-Kirk-Kilisse lines, sections of the Baghdad and the prolongation of the Aidin railway. Besides, work on the Hodeidah-Sana line has progressed rapidly.

Exceptional progress has been made in the receipts of the railways already being exploited. The total receipts for 1910 were 67,576,000 francs, as against 55,908,000 francs. This increase is mainly due to good harvests, especially those in Anatolia. The abolition of the lekere, or passport, has also influenced the passenger traffic favourably. In the order of their kilometric receipts, Turkish railways can be classified as under —

Beyrout-M'zerib	18,589
Mersina-Adana	18,511
Smyrna-Cassaba (old line)	17,537
Oriental Railways	17,321
Aidin Railway	16,938
Salonika-Monastir	16,288
Anfic-Adabazar	16,175
Jaffa-Jerusalem	15,729

Haidar-Pasha-Angora	13,256
Mudania-Brussa	11,069
Salonika-Constantinople Junction	8,369
Eski Shehir-Konio	8,292
Rayak Aleppo	7,913
Smyrna-Cassaba (extension)	5,934
Hejaz Railway	3,657
Baghdad Railway (Konia-Bulgurlur)	2,571

The increase in receipts corresponds to a proportionate decrease in the kilometric guarantees. In 1909 the State paid in guarantees 19,255,000 francs as against 14,208,000 francs in 1910, or a decrease of 5,047,000 francs. On the other hand, the Oriental Company which has a special contract with the Government, had to pay into the Exchequer 3,543,000 francs in 1910 as against 2,589,000 francs in 1909. So that when all circumstances are considered, the results of 1910 were extremely favourable both as regards the satisfactory exploitation of the lines and the general situation of the Exchequer.—(The Near East)

TURKISH RELIEF FUND COLLECTION IN INDIA

Name of place.	Name of person in charge of the Fund	THE WEEK'S PROGRESS.				To whom for warded and through what Agency.	PROGRESS UP TO DATE.						REMARKS.
		Amount collected		Amount forwarded			Amount collected			Amount forwarded
		Rs.	A	Rs.	A.		Rs.	A	P	Rs.	A	P
Murrah (Bund).	Seth H. A Haroon	210		2	6	M O Charges	19,873	7		16,580		7	For week ending 18th May

Anecdote.

IN THE days of the suffragist movement in America Miss Susan B. Anthony, the social reformer, had no more bitter opponent than Horace Greeley, the famous editor and journalist. It was for a long time his custom to wind up all debates with the conclusive remark: "The best women I know do not want to vote."

When the New York Constitution was being altered in 1867, Miss Anthony laid a trap for him, says a biographer. She wrote to Mrs. Greeley and persuaded her not only to sign a petition herself, but to circulate the paper and get three hundred signatures among her acquaintances.

In Committee Mr. Greeley, who was chairman, had listened to the debate, and was prepared to introduce to the Convention, an adverse report. He was just about to utter his usual "settler" when George William Curtis rose.

"Mr. Chairman," said he, "I hold in my hand a petition for suffrage signed by three hundred women of Westchester, headed by Mrs. Horace Greeley."

The chairman's embarrassment could hardly be controlled. He had found that one of the "best women I know" wanted to vote.

MANY stories are told of the wit of Sir H. Beerbohm Tree and one of the best is related by Miss Constance Collier. The incident happened while she was rehearsing for the part of the heroine in a production at His Majesty's Theatre. The author of the play was there, making various suggestions.

"In this scene," he said, "the hero should pick you up, Miss Collier, and carry you off the stage across his shoulder."

Miss Collier objected, but the author insisted, till Sir Herbert came to the rescue.

"I saw a play in Italy once," said the latter, "in which the hero caught hold of the heroine by the legs and banged her head on the floor."

"Splendid!" exclaimed the author. "What was the play?"

"Punch and Judy" was the actor's retort.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says:—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him..... Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....as a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

Apply to the Manager, THE "COMRADE,"
109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Corporation of Calcutta.

NOTICE.

Applications are invited and will be received up to the 21st July 1912, by the Health Officer to the Corporation from Mahomedan Hospital Assistants for the two posts of Sub-Registrars of deaths at Bagmati and Tilhulla Burial Grounds.

The salary will be Rs. 50 per month in the grade of Rs. 50—65.

The selected candidates will be required to subscribe and conform to the rules of the Provident Fund, etc.

Applicants must hold diplomas from a Government Medical Institution and state their age, relationship with any one in the service of the Corporation and enclose copies of diplomas and testimonials.

C. C. CHATTERJEE,
Secretary to the Corporation.

MUNICIPAL OFFICE,
Calcutta, the 20th May 1912.

طلسم هوش ربا

طلسم هوش ربا ایک مشہور کتاب ہے جس میں عجیب و غریب انصافے مذکور ہیں۔ ایک زمانہ میں اس کتاب کا ایک چرچا تھا۔ ناظرین ان انصافوں کو پڑھ کر حیرت و حیرت رہ گئے تھے اور بے اختیار اس کے مصنف کو دان دیتے تھے کہ وہ کیا باتیں دماغ سے نکالی ہیں! مگر وہ تو فقط انصافے ہی تھے اب اصلی چیز ملاحظہ کیجئے۔ زولفونوں رکارت پر صحت بچائے اور ۲۲ سالوں کے ۶ چھ گالے چھانچے میں اور چھوٹوں گالے حسب معمول صرف عمار میں روپیہ میں لکھیں۔

ایک زولفونوں رکارت پر مشہور گویوں کے مقبول گالے اور ۶ چھ گالے اور قیمت صرف عمار روپیہ۔ ہمارے قدر دان بھینے کے ساتھ ان طلسمی رکاردوں کے منتظر تھے اور ہمارے ایجنٹ تقاضے پر تقاضا کر رہے تھے۔ اب آپ کی ضمانت طبع کے واسطے یہ حاضر ہیں۔ ان گالوں کی بھید مالک ہے اسلئے نوڑا خرید فرمائے۔

اس مہینے کے اردر رکاردوں کی نہرست قیمتہ گارڈ کریں گالوں سے لیا اب ہے۔ کون نہیں جانتا کہ محمدی جان۔ محمد حسین۔ حالکی ہائی۔ اپنے اپنے الہام میں مقبول خاص عام میں۔ مگر قاری عبد الباقی صاحب ایک مقدمہ بزرگ میں جلیوں نے بڑے ذوق و غور کی کیفیت میں حضرت فیث الاسلام عبد القادر گیلانی علیہ الرحمۃ کی شان میں ۲۵ فرلین لکھیں ہیں۔ ان کے ساتھ سے قلب پر بڑا اثر پڑتا ہے۔ بنارس کی گندھارلوں کے گالے تو ایسے پسندہ موئے ہیں کہ ان کی تعریف لکھنے کی ضرورت میں نہیں۔ طلسمی رکارت کو ضرور سنلیگا ورنہ آپ کو حیرت میں رہیں گی۔

الم

دی گریمرٹون کمپنی لمیٹڈ۔

پوسٹ بکس نمبر ۴۸ کلکتہ

WANTED

An Indian Christian Lady, fully conversant with Hotel management. Must be at least 40 years of age. Pay Rs 30-5-50, by annual increments of rupees five. Apply with copies of testimonials (which will not be returned) to—

X., c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"

25-5-12 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta.

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh, B.A., LL.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with—

"K" c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta.

The All-India Tea & Trading Co., Limited.

Head Office:—SYLHET.

Capital:—Rs 10,00,000 (Ten Lakhs).
Divided into 40,000 shares of Rs 25, payable in five annual instalments.

A large area 5,300 acres, suitable for tea has already been secured, and the work of reclamation commenced from November 1911.

Board of Directors:—Hon'ble D. C. Deb Bahadur, Senior Government Pleader; Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid, B.L., Zemindar and Tea proprietor; Babu N. K. Roy, Dastidar, Zemindar; S. M. Chaudhury, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; B. N. Sarma, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert; M. C. Datta, pleader; N. N. Datta, B.L., pleader; P. C. Datta, B.L., pleader; D. N. Datta, Manager, Kalmingar Tea Estate; H. C. Singha, pleader; J. Tushnet, Merchant and Tea proprietor; Dr B. K. Nandy, L.M.S., and proprietor, Baikunthapur Agricultural Farm.

Managing Director:—Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid.

Secretary:—Babu H. C. Sinha.

Organisers:—Babu S. C. Sinha, late Editor, Weekly Chronicle, K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert.

Bankers:—The Sylhet Loan Co. Ltd.
Already a considerable number of shares has been taken up.

Reliable and respectable Agents for sale of shares are wanted in all parts of India and Burma.

For Forms and Prospectuses, etc., apply to—

H. C. SINHA,

8-6-12

Secretary

The Regular Homoeopathic College,

118-2, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopathy, Dr. K. C. Nag, M.D., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica," Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, for teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years (H.L.M., S & H) M.H. titles. Most regular lectures. The Staff most experienced and efficient and includes Drs. Younan and I. M. Mallick. Best lectures in "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class. Dissection arranged. Evening Classes. A few free Studentships for deserving Mohammedan students. Rooms fitted with electric lights and fans. New Sessions open on the 3rd June. Apply to the SUPERINTENDENT at 43, Cornwallis Street Calcutta.

25-6-12.

WANTED

CANVASSERS

Apply for terms to:—MANAGER,

"The Comrade,"

109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN
TYPOGRAPHICAL
DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

In Aid of
The Moslem University Fund.
Dr. Iqbal's National Song.
Sung By
A Muhammadan Gentleman of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

Nos. 9-12524.

9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of
The Gramophone Company,
Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A.:—"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth."

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Houtsma, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopedia of Islam:—"Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstoi:—"The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews:—"Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the 'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and Rs. 4-8 or 6s. for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,
REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Qadian, Punjab

5-10-12

DO YOU WANT TO EARN Rs. 3? A DAY.—

Reliable persons will be provided with Constant Home Work on DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS by Hosiery Manufacturers. Experience Unnecessary—Distance Immaterial.

DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS are easy to learn. We show you how to work the machine—to make the Hosiery, which you do at home. We purchase the finished work and pay you handsomely.

WHAT OTHERS SAY.

JUBBULPORE, C. P..

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-Knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your Knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,
Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

Morris.

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 22. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, June 1, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1.

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
THE WEEK	485	Persia contd
TETE A TETE—		The Trans-Persian Railway	495
An Important Correction	487	The Troubles of Persia	495
The Public Works Department	487	MOROCCO
Persia	487	News of the Week	496
The Muslim University Con-		News by the English Mail	496
sultation Committee	488	THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
"Disreputable Journalism"	488	News of the Week	499
The War News	488	News by the English Mail	499
Sanitation	489	The Occupation of Rhodes	500
The Near East	489	The Closing of the Dardanelles	502
LEADING ARTICLES—		Turkey's firm Resolve—
The Dacca University	489	The Views of the Grand
Some War Publications I.	491	Vizier	504
DACCA UNIVERSITY	493	The Views of the War
TURKISH RELIEF FUND	494	Minister	504
ANECDOTAGE	494	Letters to the Press—
PERSIA—		Muslim Unity	505
News of the Week	495	British Interests in the East	505
News by the English Mail	495	The War and Egypt	505
		Italian "Victories"	505
		ADVERTISEMENTS	506—508

The Week.

The Mediterranean Strategy.

THE British position in the Mediterranean is being much discussed. The military correspondent of the Times says none of us can see our way clearly until the conditions at the close of this mischievous war are fully known. Anyhow, if battleships are withdrawn from the Mediterranean, Malta, Gibraltar, and Egypt must be strengthened sufficiently to make them stormproof until our naval supremacy is re-established, which means ultimately an addition of many millions to our naval estimates.

Lord Charles Beresford, addressing a Unionist meeting in Cardiff, congratulated Mr. Churchill on the statesmanlike and commonsense methods which he had introduced into the Admiralty. Lord Beresford was perfectly certain that the meeting between Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill and Lord Kitchener would result in increasing the garrisons at Malta and Gibraltar and in Egypt, and so remove the great risks now existing in connection with our position in the East. In conclusion, he violently attacked Mr. McKenna's administration at the Admiralty.

Lord Kitchener started for Malta on the 26th May, where he will meet Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill.

A message to the Times from Paris says that it is announced that Messrs. Asquith and Churchill, after conferring with Lord Kitchener at Malta, will visit Bizerta. According to the same correspondent the visit is regarded as specially important in view of the problems of naval strategy in the Mediterranean which are now being considered by the British and French authorities. Discussing the suggestions for an Anglo-French Alliance he points out that Anglo-French relations in the Mediterranean and the Near East are not yet sufficiently clear for such a step. Commenting on suggestions of certain French journals that the naval defence of Egypt and Malta and the route to India be left solely to the French Fleet, the correspondent says that these represent interests so vast that they cannot be summarily disposed of in speculations about the future basis of Anglo-French relations. French opinion generally indicates that there are many difficulties in the way of the suggested Alliance, especially the inadequacy of Britain's army.

Replying to suggestions from various quarters that the Anglo-French Entente should be converted into an alliance, the Manchester Guardian, in a significant statement, declares that there is no ground for such a perilous change in our policy which would render the international system more unstable and greatly increase the prospect of a European war.

Bizerta is a heavily fortified port on the coast of the French protectorate of Tunis. It has one of the finest harbours in the Mediterranean, and is a few miles south of Sardinia.

Though the suggestion of an Anglo-French alliance is generally received with coolness by the Press of both countries, it is regarded as beyond doubt that the Malta meeting will have an important bearing on the naval position in the Mediterranean, where, according to the French view, the growing strength of Italy and Austria will tend to neutralise the French contribution to an Anglo-French alliance. In this connection the Daily Telegraph points out that if the Dominions make some sacrifice and respond to Mr. Churchill's appeal, the idea of withdrawing battleships from the Mediterranean could be abandoned. The Telegraph outlines a scheme by which our kinsmen would enable us to provide an Imperial Service Squadron, which would be based at Gibraltar, and would be the pivot force of the Empire. It might consist of eight Dreadnoughts and twelve smaller cruisers, costing three millions annually. The Telegraph suggests the following annual contributions—Canada £500,000, Australia £700,000; New Zealand £400,000; South Africa £250,000, and the United Kingdom £750,000. It suggests the creation of an Imperial Naval Committee on which the Dominions would be represented, and says that the Imperial Squadron should be largely manned and officered by those from Overseas Dominions.

Sir Ian Hamilton, who is at Malta, has postponed his visit to England till after the departure of Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill, whose coming conference with Lord Kitchener continues to engross British and French papers. The Times states that Messrs. Asquith and Churchill will afterwards visit Bizerta.

The Westminster Gazette, in an article, says there could scarcely be a more inopportune moment for irresponsible talk of a French Alliance and hopes that the good sense of the message from the Paris correspondent of the Times will check it. "We may be sure," the journal adds, "that a large extension of military liabilities is no more to the minds of Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill than the idea of leaving British interests in the Mediterranean to be guarded by another Power." The Journal des Debats welcomes the suggested Alliance, but deprecates exciting susceptibilities, especially regarding compulsory military service, which it says is a question Britain must decide for herself.

Lord Kitchener arrived at Malta on the 29th May followed by Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill.

Reuter is informed that the reports attributing an international political character to the meeting of Lord Kitchener, Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill at Malta are wholly unfounded. It is known that Lord Kitchener is taking advantage of the presence of the Ministers near Egypt to express to them his views on the situation in the Mediterranean, but greatly exaggerated inferences have been drawn therefrom.

The Times in a special article points out that the British naval changes in the Mediterranean do not constitute the abandonment of the Mediterranean now or in the future. It prints extracts from the speeches of Mr. Churchill on 18th March and 15th May, and says:—"In view of these it is difficult to understand how the idea that we were about to entrust our interest in the Mediterranean to anything but a British fleet can have obtained credence." The Times in an editorial article says recent discussions on Anglo-French relations have had an excellent result in showing the strength and cordiality of the mutual regard between two nations. That very fact is a reason against the suggested transformation into formal Alliance of an entente which has already been tested in actual crisis and has proved equal to the strain. The situation, says the Times, is certainly not for pessimism and with the facts of European and the imperial situation before them discussions between Cabinet Ministers and Lord Kitchener at Malta are not likely to take a despondent turn.

The Press Act.

LORD CREWE, replying to a communication from the Institute of Journalists protesting against His Lordship's statement in the House of Lords on the 21st February, says:—"The general expression given on behalf of the Institute to the sense of loyalty and responsibility of the English newspapers in Calcutta, from which I am in no way disposed to withhold concurrence, makes it more necessary to emphasise that no newspaper in British India can, on the ground of its general views and sympathies, regard itself as beyond the reach of the statutory limitations which it has been found necessary to impose for the regulation of the Press in India. "There appears to exist a misapprehension regarding the scope and purposes of the Indian Press Acts which are not confined to the suppression of sedition and treasonable conspiracy."

Industrial Training

LORD CREWE has appointed a Committee to enquire into the facilities available to Indian students for industrial and technological training in this country, with special reference to the system in connection with the State Technical Scholarship established in 1904. The Committee is composed of Sir Theodore Morison, Sir Krishna Gupta, Mr. Reynolds, late Principal of the Manchester Municipal School of Technology, and Professor Dalby, of the Imperial Science College, South Kensington. It is understood that the Committee will visit the University centres in the United Kingdom and hear the evidence of Professors and others on whose co-operation the success of the system depends.

There are now 27 State scholars undergoing instruction in England, in America and on the Continent. Though it is believed that the system rests on a sound basis, it is held that it may be capable of improvement. It is recognised that if the full benefit that may be derived by the scholars and Indian industries is to be obtained, there must be a somewhat wider and more systematic survey than hitherto of existing facilities here. The difficulties meeting scholars on returning to India are matters for investigation there and not in England, and the present enquiry is regarded as preliminary to a full examination of the system by the Government of India.

Mesopotamia.

A CORRESPONDENT to the Pioneer describes the great irrigation scheme for Mesopotamia prepared by Sir William Willcocks, the contract for carrying out which has been placed by the Turkish Government in the hands of Sir John Jack-on. The whole scheme is estimated to cost about thirteen and three-quarter million sterling and to irrigate the area of over three and quarter million acres. The agricultural works in connection with the irrigation scheme are estimated to cost twelve and-a-half million sterling.

China.

TANG SHAO YI has tendered his resignation in consequence of the violent attacks of the National Council on account of prodigal expenditure. The Cabinet is endeavouring to persuade him not to resign. The revised budget estimate for 1912 provides for a revenue of 297 million taels, and an expenditure of 576 million taels, including extra army expenditure of thirty million taels, and provisional administrative expenditure of 110 million taels.

A manifesto has been issued in Peking directing that the disorder in Turkestan shall be suppressed by the military. With regard to the position in Kashgar and Russia's warning to the Chinese Government, news has reached Kashmir showing that the "new province," as it is called, has at last felt the effect of the revolutionary movement in China. There has been something like revolt against the established order of things and the permanent Chinese officials have been ousted from their posts. Several local Governors are reported to have been killed and Kashgar like Szechuan and Yunnan, is in the hands of the revolutionary party. No mention is made of foreigners being molested but apparently Russia considers the safety of her subjects endangered.

A telegram from Urga states that the Mongolian authorities have ordered the expulsion of Chinese from the town. Urga is situated in North Mongolia, in a basin surrounded by hills, on the north side of the plains of Gobi. It is the sacred city of the Mongols, and an important centre of trade, several routes across the Gobi converging to this point, whence a different mode of carriage is adapted for convenience across the hills and through the valleys to the north. The principal trade route is that from Kalgan in North China to Maimachin and Kiakhta.

Afghanistan.

THE Afghan Tribal levies are making slow progress at the Khost frontier, where they are opposed by the Mangals and Jadrans with some of the Suliman Khel. The regular troops have not yet entered the valley.

In connection with Khost affairs, information has been received that the Afghan General Nadir Khan, with a force of Regulars, arrived on the 17th May at the Altumar Pass, on the borders of Khost, with a force of some three thousand Regulars and some Mountain Artillery. The pass was held at the time by a small combined force of Ghilzais and Mangals, who were temporarily dislodged by the Afghan forces, but who, it appears, were able later to re-occupy the Pass. General Nadir Khan and his troops when last heard of were still encamped at the Altumar village.

A frontier correspondent says there was great lack of energy at Kabul in preparing a field force for Khost. It was not until the Amir's arrival from Jellalabad early in May that preparations were completed. The want of organized transport was at the bottom of the delay.

The Englishman's Frontier correspondent wired from Peshawar on the 27th May that the Amir has sent 40 elephants from Kabul to the Khost country for transport purposes. A Jellalabad correspondent writes that the Afghan tribal levies have entered Khost and severe fighting took place between the Mangals and Jadrans and the Afghan tribal levies, in which heavy losses occurred on both sides. The Amir's regular troops are still stationed outside the Khost country, and are unable to leave for Khost illaka, owing to insufficiency of transport arrangements. Owing to the hot weather, Kabul ponies (Yabus) are unable to carry on transport work for the troops at Khost therefore the Amir has made other transport arrangements. Mir Said Jan, the successor of Mulla Hada, has returned to Hada in Jellalabad district with a party of leading Mullahs from the Khost country who went there by order of the Amir to preach loyalty to the Jagi and Mangal tribes.

News now coming in from the Khost border points to the possibility of an amicable settlement of the trouble in that part of Afghanistan, negotiations having been opened between the Commander of the Afghan troops and the rebel Mangals.

There is no truce news from Khost, but there is a rumour that the number of Suliman Khel with the Mangal rebels is increasing. The pressure upon the Governor of Khost at Matum has been relaxed since the Afghan regular force appeared at Altumar.

New Delhi.

COLONEL COLE laid the foundation stone of the Secretariat buildings in temporary Delhi this morning in the presence of the principal residents.

No successor has been yet appointed to Mr. Ward, Engineer to the new city, who is laid up with enteric fever.

Eighty-seven bungalows for subordinates are being erected west of the Ridge, the work proceeding day and night.

The question as to the date on which the Government of India will formally take over the Delhi enclave is now under consideration. The best time would probably be in September, as various details remain to be settled.

The Indian Collieries.

We have been requested by the Chief Inspector of Mines in India to publish, in advance of his Annual Report, the following figures relating to the output of Coal in British India during the year 1911:—

Province.	Tons.
Bengal	11,468,904
Central Provinces	211,616
Punjab	36,575
Eastern Bengal and Assam	294,893
Baluchistan	42,598
North-West Frontier Province	140

TOTAL ... 12,054,746

TETE À TETE

Apropos of a statement about money sent from India to Turkey for the relief of war sufferers falling into Italian hands, which we had published some months ago, a kind friend sends us an extract from a letter, dated 20th April, 1912, from the Inspector General, Ottoman Red Crescent Society, Constantinople, stating as follows:—

An Important Correction.

"With regard to your statement concerning the news given by your Press that we have no means of sending money to Tripoli and that a large portion of the relief fund fell into the hands of the Italians, we declare that these rumours are without foundation. To the contrary, we have various means to send money from every Islamic congregation. We are taking this opportunity of letting you know that the Muhamadan World is sympathising with us and our Relief Fund is receiving contributions from our brothers in faith, which funds are being distributed to the wounded and the families of the killed." We much regret that we should have been led to publish such a misleading statement. Our only excuse is that it was made to us by a very responsible Moslem leader whose word we had no reason to doubt. Since publishing it we have made efforts to satisfy ourselves as to its correctness, for it had caused much uneasiness to our readers and others. This we had announced in an earlier issue and were awaiting an authoritative statement from Turkey when the above extract was received. We are heartily glad that the earlier statement is proved to have been in correct and only regret that we ever published it.

THE Resolution of the Government of India in the Public Works Department, which was published in the Gazette of India of 18th May 1912, embodies an important scheme "which provides for the abolition of the dual cadre, the equalisation of the period for promotion to executive rank in the two services, and the increase of the pay of the Provincial officer to an amount which shall bear, as nearly as possible, the same proportion to the pay of the Imperial officer, as that which existed prior to the introduction of the new scales in 1908." The scheme that has hitherto been in force since 1908 was introduced with a view to substituting time scale of pay for the graded system of promotion formerly in force and to effecting a complete separation of the Imperial and Provincial Engineer establishments "by placing them in two distinct cadres with different rates of promotion to executive rank." Under that scheme an Assistant Engineer in the Provincial service reached the executive rank after ten years while his confère of the Imperial Service got promotion to the same rank two years earlier. The complete separation of the services, moreover, emphasised the distinction that, in some of its results, is nothing if not invidious. The two cadres exist side by side in complete isolation in every branch of the public service. Not only the system holds out but scant promise of official recognition in the shape of promotion to deserving Indians, but it also casts an unmerited slur on the members of what Mr. Dadabhoi Naoroji called the "Pariah Services." It was, therefore, inevitable that the Provincial Engineers should feel aggrieved, even though some advantages had been held out to them in the matter of pay. We are glad the Government did not take long to realise that "the members of the Provincial Engineer service attach much greater importance to being borne on a combined list with their Imperial confères," and recognised the desirability of abandoning the attempt "to carry out fully the recommendations of the Public Service Commission for a separate Provincial Service, so far as the Public Works Department is concerned." The revised scheme abolishes the dual cadre and equalises the period of promotion to executive rank. Henceforth an Assistant Engineer, whether on the Provincial or the Imperial list, will attain to executive rank after 11 years. The rates of pay now sanctioned for the members of the Provincial Engineer service, it must be noted, are not wholly free from certain anomalies. The Assistant Engineer in this branch of the service will get the starting pay of Rs. 250 per mensem with an annual increment of Rs. 25. After eleven years, he will be promoted to the rank of the Executive Engineer with the salary of Rs. 535 per mensem, the rate of subsequent annual increase being Rs. 35. After twenty years those who attain the rank of Superintending Engineer, 3rd class, will receive Rs. 1,200 per mensem, the pay of the 2nd class and the 1st class Superintending Engineer being fixed at Rs. 1,400 and 1,600 per mensem respectively. The pay of the Provincial Assistant Engineer will be 65 per cent. of that of the Imperial Assistant Engineer. The rate of annual increment in the case of the latter is fixed at Rs. 40, while in the executive rank the rate rises to Rs. 50. After twenty years, i.e., in the last grade of the executive rank, the pay of the Provincial Engineer will be 68 per cent. of that of his Imperial confrere. The Superintending Engineers of the Imperial Service will get Rs. 1,500, Rs. 1,750 or Rs. 2,000 according to the class of the rank they hold. There is no distinction of pay in the case of the Chief Engineers, who will get the Imperial rates of pay irrespective of the service to which they belong. Now the very first anomaly that strikes us is that a Superintending Engineer of the Provincial Service will, in the 3rd class, be actually getting less pay than the Imperial Executive Engineer in his twentieth year of service. They will be getting Rs. 1,200 per mensem and Rs. 1,250 per mensem respectively, i.e., a subordinate will be paid Rs. 50 per mensem more than his superior officer. If the gradation of ranks in a service is based on the importance of work and increase of responsibility in the ascending scale, we do not know how to justify this disparity of treatment. As regards the general scale of pay sanctioned for the Provincial service, we see very little reason to feel satisfied with the present state of things. The higher rates of pay allowed to the members of the Imperial Service can only be justified on the ground that they, as a class, are more efficient. If the difference continues to exist only on the score of relative efficiency we trust steps will be immediately taken to bring the Engineering Institutions in this country up to date in general equipment and raise the standard of training they impart to the required level. It is sometimes maintained that the Europeans, who mainly comprise the service, have a higher standard of living and consequently their salaries should be proportionately greater. Whatever force there may be in this contention, it does not justify a differential treatment when the requirements of efficiency have been fully satisfied. It must, at the same time, be remembered that the Indians have often to support a larger family in addition to a number of distant relatives and dependents, and the proportion of their private expenditure becomes much larger in the aggregate. Again, a growth in the standard of living, as we have been often told, is the true measure of the economic progress of a country. If the Indians are paid at a lower rate because their standard of living is lower, we do not know how that standard can be raised. Here we have the ugly dilemma that confronted the poet—

دردیان قهر دریا تختہ بندم کردہ *

ناز می گوئی کہ دامن تو مکن مہیار باش

THE latest news from Persia lays bare another Russian intrigue in process of development, with Salar-ud-Daulah as the tool. A semi-official statement comes from St. Petersburg that the brother of the ex-Shah has asked the Regent to call a conference for the consideration of the manner in which the government of the country should be carried on. His patriotic counsel is accompanied by a characteristic bluster, and he warns the Regent that, if his demand is ignored, he would march with his 150,000 men on Teheran. It is apparent now that Russia has taken Salar-ud-Daulah under her wings and is secretly encouraging him to push forward his scheme for the overthrow of the Government and to set up a Russian dictatorship with himself as a nominal despot. He has selected what is called "the neutral zone" as his base of operations; and it is not at all difficult for him, under the present disturbed conditions of the country, to collect a rabble round his standard by holding out temptations of pillage or threats of violence. The patronage that the semi-official press of Russia is extending to this latest adventurer and the sympathy with which his bellicose manifestoes are being published can hardly be mistaken. It needs a very wide stretch of the imagination to realise the vast and intricate organisation that Salar-ud-Daulah must have established in order to keep himself in touch with his official channels of communication. The insistence of Russia on one of the conditions of the joint loan, which required the army of the Fedais to be disbanded, acquires a new significance in the light of recent events. The Fedais are the patriotic civilians who voluntarily enrolled themselves into a standing force for active service in the cause of order and good government. They could be trusted to shed their last drop of blood in defence of their country. But the Salar-ud-Daulah coup had to be developed and, therefore, they were required to get out of the way. The Anglo-Russian responsibility in the matter cannot be recognized by diplomacy, because, forsooth, the rebel has elected to plant himself in "the neutral zone." The Persian Government is technically free to adopt any measures it thinks best to suppress him. Under the cir-circumstances we think the Persian Government should seek the help of the Turkish authorities for the expulsion of Salar-ud-Daulah. It would be the easiest and most practical method of adding the country of an adventurer who has appeared in his original character as the Russian protégé. We know a similar suggestion was vetoed some time ago by the Russian dictators at Teheran. But there stands no diplomatic or treaty obligations in the way of the Persian Government if it boldly insists on adopting any measures it deems necessary in a part of the country that the Anglo-Russian Convention has left out of the scheme of partition. We trust the Regent will act boldly at this juncture before the latest Russian coup is decisively launched.

We wish to draw the attention of the Trustees of the M. A. O. College,

The Moslem University Constitution Committee.

Aligarh, to the announcement recently made by the Honorary Secretary of the College, with the permission of the President of the Constitution Committee, to the effect that, in accordance with an earlier decision arrived at on the subject, the Trustees are ex officio members of the Committee and are, therefore, fully entitled to take part in its discussions and to vote. The next meeting of the Committee is to be held at Lucknow on the 2nd and 3rd June. We need hardly say that a serious importance attaches to this meeting in view of the fact that the constitution of the proposed University is to be finally settled as far, at any rate, as the Mussalmans themselves are concerned. We trust the meeting will be a thoroughly representative and well-attended gathering and its deliberations will be marked by the earnestness and high purpose that the importance of the occasion demands. We await its decisions with deep interest.

Not very long ago we had occasion to refer to the methods with which the Amrita Bazar Patrika had sought to traverse some disagreeable statements made by a correspondent of the Times, which it had characterised as "disreputable journalism." We had regretted that the Patrika should have delighted to use the same weapons which it had so righteously set out to discredit with all the wealth of its picturesque innuendo and not very choice vocabulary. Experience, however, has shown that the methods of our contemporary are its most effective weapons, that they are the only weapons it has learnt to use, and that it is idle to expect that exposure and ridicule would alter the nature of its psychology. The Patrika is an apt illustration of what Indian journalism can become in certain hands under certain contingencies. Those who occasionally turn its columns for the sake of the queer amusement they afford, must have greatly relished the crude subterfuges and almost childish insinuations with which the "Young Behar" is being held up to public derision. It has not forgiven the Beharces for the frank and unalloyed joyousness with which they have hailed their deliverance from the yoke of Bengal. It is, in turn, imploring them, threatening them with disaster, taunting them with a disorganised exchequer, a rootless secretariat and a houseless Lieutenant Governor and shedding crocodile tears over the loss of peace, goodwill and harmony divine. All this, however, is the Patrika's way, and one can even feel a certain amount of pity for the mental and moral crisis through which it is passing. But the apparent fatuity of our contemporary sometimes conceals elements of deliberate mischief. A couple of paragraphs in its issue of the 28th May furnish an instance in point. After quoting a long extract from "our Bankipur correspondent", bristling with dark rumours and insinuations, for which it characteristically disclaims all responsibility, it, nevertheless, proceeds to comment on "the pieces of interesting news" with that freedom from scruples beloved of its methods. Its "Bankipur correspondent"—the Patrika's "correspondents" are, by the way, as numerous as its wishes—sends it "a piece of news" to the effect that "a mandate has come from a certain higher quarter to some of the local magnates to engineer a widespread agitation for a High Court at Bankipur." The only comment that the Patrika deems it necessary to make is that no "artificial" agitation can hope to succeed as long as the Government of India is presided over by "a ruler shrewd and lynx-eyed enough to distinguish between chaff and grain." It then asserts that the people of Orissa, Chota Nagpur and "a vast number of Beharces have no interest in having a High Court at Bankipur." "Indeed, if a High Court is at all needed for Behar," continues the Patrika, "it is mainly for the benefit of a section of the local lawyers, and possibly also for that of Mr. Ali Imam when his term of office expires." Whether a High Court is needed for Behar or not, we trust the Beharce will argue it out with the Patrika, if indeed, the former has not already exhausted all its wealth of vituperation in teaching us "a much-needed lesson." As regards the lines we have italicised, we confess we have never come across a viler and more disreputable exhibition of paltry innuendo in the course of our journalistic experience. There is a more honest effrontery even in the gutter Press that thrives on the reek of personalities. The insinuation is unworthy of any newspaper having the least pretensions to good sense, decency and ordinary journalistic decorum. Bengalee Journalism is, no doubt, resourceful and not very chary of methods. But there ought to be some limit to the growth of the chartered liberties of the Press, even though the variety is so prolific in Bengal. If this is how the Patrika guides "public opinion" and represents the grievances of "the people," we can well understand the sigh of relief with which the Beharces have got their deliverance.

"Disreputable Journalism"

Such questionable stuff is wired to India by Reuter in the shape of The War News

Turko-Italian war news that it becomes an exceedingly difficult process to separate the grain from the chaff. Sometimes it is all chaff, and no amount of search can lead to the discovery of a single grain of truth. It is not difficult to produce scores of instances in which Reuter has cabled to this country purely Italian versions of events in Tripoli and elsewhere which subsequent information has shown to have been utterly baseless and false. To take a recent instance, we were informed by Reuter towards the end of April that "a telegram to the Daily Chronicle from Constantinople on the 26th April states that the Italian bombardment of the Dardanelles destroyed Kumkaleh Fort, killing 300 Turks. Needless to say, the news was absolutely incorrect and the Turkish Minister of War sent a categorical denial of it to the Press. As a matter of fact, only one soldier was killed and one wounded, one horse was killed and the dormitories of the barracks were destroyed. The Minister had also offered 'to authorise a Foreign Military Attaché to visit the Dardanelles forts and report upon his inquiries.' Dr. Sandler, the author of the report to the Daily Chronicle, had also formally denied the accuracy of his statement and explained that "he had been led into error on the subject of the Turkish losses at the Dardanelles and had telegraphed to the Daily Chronicle in perfectly good faith," and that "as soon as he realised that his good faith had been surprised he expressed his regrets to the authorities and telegraphed a denial to the Chronicle." In spite of all this, however, no correction has been forthcoming from Reuter. It would be interesting to mention here that the Italian losses in the Dardanelles fight were considerable. Notwithstanding positive official denials, it has now been established, beyond any possibility of doubt, that the Italian cruiser Varesse was sunk and some of the battleships and minor craft were severely damaged. The Mutsarrif of Lemnos has captured a huge quantity of flotsam that had been washed ashore from Varesse and has sent it to Constantinople. The Milan correspondent of the Daily Chronicle gives a detailed account of the injuries sustained by the Italian fleet. The following extract from his report will, we are sure, be read with interest:—"Despite the repeated assurances of the Italian Government that no damage whatever had been sustained by any of the ships in the recent attack on the Dardanelles, news is leaking out which tends to show that this statement must be accepted cum grano sale. In addition to the admissions made by a member of the expedition aboard Admiral Viale's flagship, as regards the piercing of the Guribali's armour-plate in several places, and further admissions about the damage aboard the Ferruccio, confirmed by its commander in a published letter, La Sera (Milan) prints an interview of its Catania correspondent with a naval officer belonging to the Guribali, who has just been invalided home, in which the officer states that during the attempt to blow up the Turkish war vessels anchored in the Straits at midnight on 18th April two torpedo destroyers, the Perseo and Alcione, did really succeed in penetrating the Dardanelles, but on account of the thick darkness prevailing and the great velocity at which they were travelling the destroyers were unable to collision and were so badly damaged that they had instantly to withdraw, escorted by others near the entrance. This is the real reason why the attack was abandoned."

THE Government of India have issued an important Resolution on the question of improvement and strengthening the sanitary services in this country. The administrative machinery of the Sanitary Department itself is claimed to be fairly efficient.

The improvements that are sought to be effected "are in the direction of further decentralisation of the control, of widening the field of recruitment by throwing open the higher posts to fully qualified Indians of proved aptitude, and of strengthening the staff in some provinces in which at present it is admittedly inadequate." The local Governments have been empowered to select their own Sanitary Commissioners from officers serving in the Provincial Sanitary Departments. The number of Deputy Sanitary Commissioners has been increased by eight in order to ensure greater efficiency of supervision. An important departure has been made in the matter of the appointment of these officers by throwing the posts open to qualified Indians, while the appointments will no longer be reserved for members of the Indian Medical Service. Another important feature of the improvements embodied in the Resolution is the creation of the appointment of Health Officers for large municipalities as well as smaller towns. The qualifications fixed for a Health Officer of the 1st class are rather high, as he would be required to have a British diploma of Public Health. The necessity for this, however, is considered to be temporary as the Government of India trust that the restriction would be removed as soon as facilities have been provided in this country for the training of Indians as Health Officers. The Government of India undertake to give financial assistance to the provinces whose funds do not allow of extra expenditure on Sanitation. The schemes outlined in the Resolution mark a distinct advance in the sanitary reform movement in this country. We hope the solicitude shown by the Government will induce the local Governments to put more energy and zeal into their work in this direction.

WITH its issue of 10th May 1912, the Near East completes its first year of existence. The occasion has been appropriately marked by the insertion, in its columns, of letters and special articles from prominent statesmen, journalists and men of affairs, which testify to the useful work the journal has accomplished during its short career. "Intended primarily for the benefit of Turkey, Egypt, and adjoining countries," says the Near East, "it has seen its circulation during this short period extend all over the world. Interest in the Near East is no longer confined to the United Kingdom and the Continent of Europe, for our subscribers are now to be found in British dominions in both hemispheres, in the United States of America, where many Armenians and Greeks have settled; and in India, whose Moslem population is, not unnaturally, as Lord Hardinge has said quite lately, and the Aga Khan tells us so forcibly this week, in the deepest sympathy with the troubles of their co-religionists abroad." We congratulate our contemporary on the rapid growth of its sphere of influence, and hope its efforts to achieve the great ends it has in view will continue to be inspired by sympathy, impartiality and breadth of outlook. It would be but bare justice to recognise the special pains and care with which the journal has hitherto been conducted. Its columns are a mine of useful information. In addition to an extensive correspondence devoted to Near Eastern affairs, a large variety of topics bearing on the political, commercial and financial conditions of those countries, are dealt with every week, and an enormous mass of interesting information is thus brought together in compact form. Our readers must be familiar enough with the Near East, as we have on several occasions reproduced articles and extracts from its columns. The paper meets a distinct want; and if its policy is based on sympathy and fairness towards the countries and races whose cause it professes to advocate, we have no doubt but that it has a very useful future before it. Its views on the momentous problems of the Near East have on the whole been characterised by moderation, though we must confess, it has been, at times, difficult to distinguish the standpoint of a professed friend of Turkey, Persia and Egypt from the angle of vision of a British Imperialist. We must also admit that our contemporary is not very admirably served by some of its correspondents, notably from Cairo, Salonica and Constantinople. The bias in these cases is only too painfully apparent, and one feels a conscious effort being made to distort facts to fit in with preconceived theories of political development in the East. Under the circumstances, our contemporary cannot be said as yet to have risen to a stage of self-discipline and balance which are so necessary for the realisation of its ideals. If its ambition to become the organ of Moslem opinion is to be achieved, it shall have to thoroughly identify itself with the Moslem standpoint.

The Near East.

The Comrade.

The Dacca University.

THE administrative changes announced at the Durbar were too tremendous and sudden not to have stirred the feelings of people forcibly, and although this may not justify the fitful lamentations of the Anglo-Indian community in Calcutta even to-day, in which the most pitiable mourners are some of our local contemporaries, it certainly explains the passionateness of many protests made at the time. When time has swept a little longer over the country, and things attain their proper level, a just critic would, we believe, declare that the new régime in India was one of good measures badly carried out. And this verdict would not be confined only to the changes announced at Delhi but to most of the acts of the present Government. Wrong methods have involved right measures in unnecessary odium, and statesmanlike projects have received an undeservedly bad reception because of unstatesmanlike procedure.

The proposed Dacca University is one of them, for the time and place at which it was first announced, and the manner of that announcement were such that a beneficent educational measure was bound to be regarded with a remarkable unanimity as a malicious political blow or an unsatisfactory political compensation. Replying to a deputation of some Bengalee gentlemen of great eminence, His Excellency the Viceroy said in conclusion: "I am hopeful that the large issues of educational policy, on which the future of India so greatly depends, will be viewed with a wide outlook, and apart from personal or political interests." Earlier in that speech the Viceroy had declared that "the constitution of a University at Dacca and the appointment of a special educational officer at Dacca rest solely on grounds of educational policy, both general and local," and had advanced the most convincing argument in support of the declaration, viz., that "before the arrangements announced by His Imperial Majesty were considered, the Government of India had included in their educational programme the constitution of teaching and residential universities, including a University at Dacca." But if these purely educational projects had not been announced, with some dramatic accompaniments, to a Moslem deputation which waited on His Excellency at Dacca to know what compensation his Government had decided to offer to their long suffering and depressed community for the loss of its recently acquired political power, the Viceroy would have been spared the trouble of attempting to convince the Anti-Partitionists Redeemers that "it was never the intention of the Government of India that there should be a line of cleavage in the Educational Department of the new province as between the two Bengals," and that "no proposals which could possibly lead to the internal partition or division of Bengal would meet with any support from the Government of India." Could it convince anybody that the numerical Moslem majority resulting from the Partition which led to all the excesses of the Anti-Partition campaign, and the disappearance of which caused the campaigners unfeigned jubilation which would have known no bounds if it had not been tempered by the back-stroke of the change of Capital—was a thing of no value to the Mussalmans? We are sure we are in the right that whosoever may have thought so, the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal—or, for the matter of that, of any Province—did not think so. We are equally sure that when the deputation waited on His Excellency at Dacca, its members expected some compensating boon that would in some measure reconcile them to the loss of their numerical majority in the now defunct province. What then could have been more natural than the idea that the Viceroy's announcement of a University at Dacca and the appointment of a separate educational officer was the long expected compensation? The Mussalmans and the Hindus alike took it as such, and while the former regarded it as wholly inadequate and even irrelevant, the latter saw in it the re-incarnation of the spirit of the Partition and opposed it. His Excellency, of course, explained at great length to this deputation how it came about that it was to the Moslem deputation at Calcutta that he had first announced the educational projects of his Government. But the mischief had already been done, and there has been little attempt during the four months that have elapsed since the announcement of the Government's educational policy at following His Excellency's well-meant and very necessary advice that these educational projects should be viewed with a wide outlook and apart from personal or political interests. Almost the only attempt to discuss the proposals on their own merits has been made by Mr. P. Chaudhuri in a very thoughtful and well reasoned paper recently read by him at a meeting of the Constitutional Club and reproduced in three successive issues of the Bengalee, and we hope it will arrest the attention of the Committee now appointed to frame a scheme for the Dacca University, even though it is somewhat general and discursive.

We had explained our own attitude towards the proposed Dacca University in the issue of 17th February last, in which we had stated that, in the first place, our previous remarks "have not been directed against the promised University as such, but against its being debited to the long-suffering Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal"; that, in the second place, we had some misgivings that "the University at Dacca may help to cut off the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal from the Moslem University"; and that, in the third place, "although the creation of a teaching University at the very doors of the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal is bound to lessen the value of another teaching University at Aligarh, that is no reason why those who advocated the latter should come in the way of the former." In fact, we had gone still further and added that, "for our part, we wish every University in India was a teaching University, and if the creation of fresh Universities means more education or better education, we shall continue to accord them a warm and a cordial welcome." Finally, we had stated that "we have already admitted our readiness to admit that the people of Eastern Bengal would receive greater consideration for their special requirements than they have been doing at Calcutta."

To these views we still adhere; but, we must confess, we note with regret that in one important particular the project of the Dacca University as it is now embodied in the Bengal Government Resolution, which we publish elsewhere, is even less favourable to the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal than we and they had at first understood. The terms of reference to the committee which His Excellency the Governor in Council is pleased to appoint are wide enough and "leave full latitude to the Committee in framing their recommendations." But the Bengal Government's resolution goes further than any published statement of the Government of India in rigorously limiting the jurisdiction of the University to the town of Dacca so that "it should not include any college which is beyond the limits of the town." When His Excellency the Viceroy's announcement at Dacca was published on the 3rd February last, there was nothing in it which could lead one to suppose that the Dacca University would not include in its jurisdiction the whole of Eastern Bengal, and in view of the fact that His Excellency discussed with the Moslem deputation "the future situation of the Muhammadan community in the new Presidency," and impressed upon them that "educational progress would be the surest safeguard for the promotion of Muhammadan interests," the inference was not wholly unwarrantable that the jurisdiction of the University would not be confined to a single town. Later, on the 16th February, His Excellency replied at length to the Hindu deputation at Calcutta in terms which have been embodied, and often reproduced, in the letter of the Hon. Mr. Sharp to the Government of Bengal, and although he dissociated his Government from all notions of an educational partition, and although he then for the first time made it clear that the Dacca University would be a teaching and residential University, that did not necessarily imply that the scope of the proposed University would be restricted within such narrow territorial limits. In fact, the Viceroy explicitly left "the questions of the scope of the Dacca University and of the position of the special educational officer" to "the new Governor to consider and advise," and if it was left to the latter to reject even "the creation of a separate cadre for Eastern Bengal," although the Viceroy could not himself imagine that it would commend itself to Lord Carmichael, it was reasonable enough to hope that the new Governor would also be given an opportunity of recommending within what limits the Dacca University should have jurisdiction.

It may be said that the very definition of a teaching University excludes every chance of a Mufassil College being affiliated to it. But even the Hon. Mr. Sharp in his letter to the Bengal Government gives a wider scope to such a University, desiring that it should bind together the colleges of "a single town or a single circumscribed area." We have no desire to follow the startling doctrines of the Hon. Sir Asutosh Mukharji, who laid it down in his very remarkable and emphatic Convocation Address, delivered in the spirit of a critical reply to the Government's recently announced administrative and educational measures, that "the reproach sometimes levelled against the existing Universities that they are merely examining bodies..... does not rest on solid ground"; that "the criticism that they are not residential in character is very wide of the mark"; that the Calcutta University "is and has always been a teaching University"; and that "it is a residential University," simply because the colleges which submit their scholars to its examinations teach all and house a small fraction of their students. But without endorsing such assertions, it may be said that the change from a University the jurisdiction of which covers the area of three whole Provinces and a Chief Commissionership to one confined to a single town is too tremendous, and that the relief provided by detaching four colleges out of fifty-two, and at the most 2,000 out of nearly 14,000 students, would not remove to any very appreciable extent the congestion in the Calcutta University. We are not in love with what are rather loosely called "federal Universities," and are inclined to endorse the Government of India's estimate of such Universities. But we emphatically hold that the rigorously circumscribed single town Universities cannot easily fit into the complogy of the loosely knit together, sprawling, and impersonal institutions which have hitherto existed, and remained uncondemned by Government even when the advocates of the Moslem University challenged a comparison between their scheme and the existing order of things. It is true that the teaching University will not benefit by any compromise, and it is also true that any time spent by its teaching staff in inspecting Mufassil Colleges affiliated to it would in some measure divert its attention from its proper work. But it is equally true that a College not at a great distance from such a University would be far better inspected and looked after by it than by another located at a place two days' journey from the latter. Imagine a College at Naraingunge or even at Comilla supervised by the Syndics of a University at Calcutta, not one of whom comes from Eastern Bengal, when it has a University next door to it at Dacca under the supervision of a Syndicate composed equally exclusively of Eastern Bengal people. No doubt the affiliation of such Colleges to a teaching University would be a compromise and not stern logic. But it would be a compromise beneficial alike to the distant Calcutta University and the neighbouring Mufassil Colleges, while impairing only to an inappreciable extent the efficiency of the teaching University located next door to such Colleges.

This is a purely general and educational aspect of the question. But there is a local and Muhammadan aspect as well. Much as Sir Asutosh Mukharji may discourse in the vein of the Greek hero of Tennyson's poem, Ulysses, he will find it difficult to convince people that Calcutta did not act like the Upas tree towards its distant undergrowth. The rapid advance of education in Eastern Bengal after the Partition is proof enough of the necessity of giving to Eastern Bengal a University of its own instead of giving one to its capital city only, and in the words of the Times of India, which, in an "intelligent anticipation of events," foreshadowed the scheme of the Dacca University, "it demands no change of policy from those in authority, for it is but the continuance of measures which would have been pushed to their logical conclusion if the development of Eastern Bengal and Assam under its own Government had not been abruptly arrested, and it is designed to secure the fulfilment of ends specifically declared in the despatch." If in these days the wishes of loyal and contented Mussalmans count for anything with Governments, we may add that the resolution moved by the Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chowdhury, and carried unanimously in the last session of the All-India Moslem League, while heartily welcoming the Dacca University, urged on the Government "the desirability of extending the operations of the proposed University over the districts of Dacca, Rajshahi and Chittagong Divisions, so far at least as the general control and supervision of the educational institutions in those areas and the prescription of the curricula of studies and the examinations are concerned." This humble petition of the Mussalmans has also gone the way of the rest, and the assurance given to the Hindu deputation that no suspicion of a partition of Bengal would be tolerated by the Government is made doubly sure by this limitation of its scope and jurisdiction.

اے ہا آرزو کہ خاک شد

(Oh, the many aspirations that have turned into ashes!)

We have been taught recently to believe that the facts most likely to be unsettled are the "settled facts" of our Government. But that may not be for all. In the case of the Mussalmans, we have to accept the hard reality that "the moving finger writes, and, having writ, moves on," and we cannot encourage them with the hope that their loyalty, or, at any rate, their contentment "shall lure it back to cancel half a line," or that such tears as they can shed can "wash out a word of it." But in one matter the sheet is still blank and it is not too much to hope that the "moving finger" may write thereon something not unlike what the Mussalmans desire. That is the appointment of an educational officer for Eastern Bengal. We have always attached to this proposal more importance from the Muhammadan point of view than to the Dacca University; for even if such an officer sought out the easiest bit of work to do, and in order to gain official glory, paid more attention to the forward Hindus than to the backward Mussalmans—a thing which is only too common to-day—even in that case the limits of 33 per cent. are soon reached, and his successor could get little audas except by falling back on the Mussalmans, who constitute 66 per cent. of the population of Eastern Bengal. But we doubt if the Hindus of Eastern Bengal need any such officer to encourage them. Among the reasons that have induced the Government of India to locate the new University at Dacca are two that present a contrast worthy of careful consideration. They "are the high level of intelligence" declared to be characteristic of the Hindu middle class population of Eastern Bengal and hence "the educational progressiveness of these districts" on the one side, and the backwardness of the Muhammadans on the other. We believe the Hindus of Western Bengal are on no lower a plane of intelligence, nor are the Presidency and Sardarwat divisions less progressive. But whether that is so or not, the Mussalmans are almost equally backward throughout the Presidency, and East and West, North and South are all alike in this respect. The only difference is that in Eastern Bengal they are more numerous, though in districts like Jubbulpore and Wardha they constitute a clear majority of the population even in Western Bengal. Would it not then, be better to appoint a separate officer for the Mussalmans alone, though of the entire Presidency rather than for both the Hindus and Mussalmans, but exclusively for Bengal? The wise union-loving Hindus of Bengal and the perverse separatists of Islam would alike favour such an arrangement, and we cannot believe that a proposal favoured by the Hindus would be rejected by the Government simply because the Mussalmans also approved of it. The Government which, in the matter of a desire for partition for any kind or shape, is so anxious to be an improvement on Caesar's wife, would in this way please the Hindus, and spare them the humiliation of being looked after by a protector of the poor and of the ignorant. As the poet of the perverse separatists has said—

شرکت غم بھی نہیں چاہتی غرت میری
غرت کی ہو کے رہے یا شب فرقت میری

(My amours propre desires not even a sharing of sorrow. Let the night of separation be either wholly my rival's or mine.)

It may be asked how it would be possible for such an officer to inspect schools and colleges in which both Hindus and Mussalmans study together. Such a question would be based on a misinterpretation of our suggestion. We do believe that the Department of Public Instruction has not paid enough attention to Moslem students and we fear it has not always dealt fairly with Moslem employes. Not to say these things out of mere politeness will do good to nobody, and as we do not ascribe evil motives to the officials, we do not think they would hear any grudge against us for indulging in some frank truths. We trust in future this will not be, and the only remedy for these evils is a watchful central administration rather than a new type of educational officers. We would, therefore, propose that the students must be left to the present set of officials strengthened by the appointment of a good many more Muhammadan officers of the rank of Inspectors, Additional Assistant and Deputy Inspectors, and that these officials must be left to the present head of the Department who is, we feel sure, as much convinced as we are of the necessity of encouraging Muhammadan officers under him in order to have his Department freed from the evil of having cliques based on divisions of caste, creed, and family. In other words, to a very large extent, the special officer that we would suggest would have little to do with Muhammadans, once they have crossed the threshold of schools and colleges. His chief concern must be with those—and they number millions—who should be at some school or college and are not. It should be his duty to bring these to the doors of the schools and colleges, and having brought them there, to leave them, for the most part, to the Department of Public Instruction and the Universities. He must set about his business by inquiring from every source, but chiefly from Moslem source, what it is that keeps the Mussalmans back in each locality from taking advantage of the facilities provided by Government for the education of the people. We have answers of our own to offer to questions like these, but they can wait for another occasion. For the present we may only say, in general, that it is not always reasons connected with the Department of Education that keep the Mussalmans back, though such reasons are not wanting, nor few. There are social, political and religious causes which are at the root of the matter, and to our mind it is not always an educational expert that can get to the bottom of these affairs. What we have in our mind when we suggest a separate officer for Moslem education, is a Civilian, not very young, but yet one that has not shed the enthusiasm for education and reform which his university education has created in him, one who has larger sympathies than the average Civilian and fewer prejudices, yet one who has personal leanings towards Mussalmans, based not on favoritism, but on a clearer understanding of their point of view, their prejudices and position, one who has been able to win the confidence of the community in his earlier official career, and would not, therefore, find their minds like a sealed book, but would get them to communicate to him freely and frankly their desires and ambition, their complaints and grievances, equally without fear and without a desire to flatter. Such officers, though they are not too numerous, are not, on the other hand, too rare either, and it is men of such character and temperament, whether their personal leanings be towards Hindus or Mussalmans, that succeed in leaving behind them a fabric of real, solid work which is never achieved by the more humdrum and featureless individuals that soon shed their youthful fervour in the blighting atmosphere of Anglo-Indian Clubs and talk of what the East loves and the Oriental requires, as if such generalisations were axioms of Euclid or part of Holy Writ, which none but the ignorant and the profane could question. An officer of the type that we have described above would diagnose the disease of the Mussalmans and, gathering experience of their peculiar malady, suggest remedies suited to their constitution and temperament. It will not be entirely left to him whether the draught prescribed should be given to the patient, nor need other communities fear that the personal leanings of such an officer would lead to favoritism in the case of one community. It will be the Government itself that will have to dispense the prescription and in this case the dispenser would have the power to modify the prescription. Such an officer need not, and we think, should not be subordinate to the Director of Public Instruction, though he is certain to consult the latter, on many occasions he should be directly subordinate to a member of the council and should have access to H. E. the Governor like Secretaries to Government. Being a Civilian he will be in a better position than an Educational officer to know a large number of influential people in the community and would carry more influence with them. In many cases, we confess, the disease of the Mussalmans is only indifference and the cure is not in the hands of the Government but in their own. In that case it is not the physician that they require but the preacher; and an officer such as the one that we have described would act as a missionary deputed by Government to convert the community from its creed of indolence and apathy to one of energy and progress. This is the remedy that we suggest, and, we believe, we have in this matter the support of the entire Muhammadan Community. To the Government we shall only say, "You have tried your own remedy in Bengal for the last 150 years and that remedy has not yet cured the patient. Is it not time to try ours, even though it be only for a while and as an experiment? You have sought the right goal but chosen the wrong path. Is it not time to let others lead you even though you are conscious of your own superior wisdom? You have tried and, to be frank, you have failed hopelessly. Why not try what we suggest and wait and see?"

All that we have said about the special Educational officer may appear to be somewhat irrelevant in a discussion of the Dacca University, but we submit that the problem is one and it is impossible to separate the two questions without laceration. In the second place, all that we know is that a teaching and residential University is sanctioned in principle by the Secretary of State and is to be located at Dacca and confined to the colleges within the town. More than that we do not know and must wait for the report of the Committee which His Excellency the Governor in Council has been pleased to appoint. It has a wide enough latitude given to it for its deliberations and we trust even those of its members that have hitherto opposed the foundation of such a University at Dacca would work on the Committee with the one desire of making the University the best that they can with the materials at their disposal. The Committee is composed for the most part of educational experts and, so far as we can judge, there is no point of view that is likely to be left unrepresented on the Committee. The situation of Dacca with its four colleges and several Oriental Madrasahs with its thousands of school boys and its palatial untenanted public buildings in addition to the beautiful scenery of its river, so well described by Mr. Bradley-Birt, is one that lends itself well enough to the purposes of educational architects, and, as one representative of Eastern Bengal has said since the partition was annulled, if Dacca is not to know the din and turmoil of politics inseparable from a seat of Government, it may be a blessing in disguise if it becomes a city of learning with the calm and quietude of a cloistered University.

Some War Publications.

THE war that is dragging on in Tripoli—and now elsewhere also—is unique in many respects. But one of its worst features has been the scantiness of reliable news, and there is much truth in the assertion that for all that we have been able to know of the operations, we might have been living in the Middle Ages and not in the twentieth century which prides itself so justly on having reduced distances and revolutionised the means of communication throughout the world. It is true that wires were kept very busy when Italy first bombarded Tripoli and then landed her troops in the Tripoli-tane and Cyrenaica. But after less than a month, silence reigned supreme and it was broken only by the War Correspondents of newspapers and news agencies who left Tripoli because they could not stand the blond-lust and butchery that took the place of courage and military skill of "the descendants of the Scipios." Truth will, however, out, and although we have been unable to secure a continuous and regular account of the military operations which we could well believe, we have had glimpses of the truth, sometimes revolting in its awfulness, and at others disgusting in being excessively ridiculous.

So far three publications* have been issued from London. The first deals with the circumstances that led to the war and the international problems, political and legal which it has created. The next to be issued is a brochure which is a rechauffé of the articles contributed, in the main, by Mr. McCullagh and the evidence of other War Correspondents with the Italian Army in support of his assertion about Italian atrocities. The last is the narrative of a War Correspondent who remained with the Turco-Arab forces for about a month and returned to Europe shortly after New Year's Day.

* 1. The Tri-co-Italian War and its Problems by Sir Thomas Barclay (London: Constable and Co., Ltd. Rs. 4-6.)

2. Italian Warfare in Tripoli and Muslim Feeling in India (W. Spraight and Sons, Fetter Lane, London. As. 2.)

3. With the Turks in Tripoli by Ernest M. Bennett. (London: Methuen and Co. Ltd. Rs. 3.)

Sir Thomas Barclay, who is a member of the Institute of International Law, naturally looks upon the war with the eye of the jurist. But in the hundred pages of his book, he devotes a good deal of space to the history of Italy's designs on Tripoli, and the British interests involved in the annexation of the Tripolitaine and Cyrenaica to the Italian Kingdom. He quotes from Cesare Balbo's "Della Speranza d'Italia" ("The Hope of Italy") written in 1842, a passage showing that Italy had dreamed of "external expansion" long before there was anything more of Italy internally than a "geographical expression." He wrote that "Whether it be to Tunis or to Tripoli, or to an island, or to any part of the Eastern Continent, matters not." Mazzini too seems to have exclaimed, "Northern Africa belongs to Italy," and Bismarck, too, wrote to the Italian patriot that "The Empire of the Mediterranean must be the constant pre-occupation of Italy, the fundamental thought of the Florentine Cabinet." He also quotes Baron Blanc, the Italian Foreign Minister, who said in a speech in the Italian Chamber in 1894 that Napoleon III. had officially given his assent to an Italian occupation of Tunis and that, at the Conference of Berlin in 1878, it had been suggested that Italy might secure her position there without objection from the Powers. Sir Thomas then traces the designs of Italy on Tripoli from the resentment caused by the occupation of Tunis by France in 1881, leading to the resignation of the then Italian Cabinet and the alliance of Italy with Germany and Austria on 30th May 1882. Mr. Bennet quotes a conversation of Napoleon III. with the Prince Consort as early as 1857 in which the French monarch suggested that "a part of Tripoli might be given to Sardinia," and when the French had occupied a part of Northern Africa, where Italian settlers greatly outnumbered the French, Crispien set to secure the definite reversion of Tripoli to Italy. He constantly wrote to Lord Salisbury on the subject, assuring him in those pre-emptive days that "the Republic is bent on occupying that region [Tripoli] as proved by her incessant encroachments on the Frontier . . . If we had Tripoli, Bizerta would no longer be a menace either to Italy or Great Britain." In reply, Lord Salisbury consoled this ardent Italian minister by saying that "he agrees that when the day arrives for any alteration, great or small, it is indispensable that the occupation of Tripoli should be undertaken by Italy." How lightly political brigandage is regarded by the cultured diplomats of Europe can be judged from a very sporting remark of Lord Salisbury, who was also responsible for the elegant expression of the turf, that in supporting Turkey in 1878 "they had backed the wrong horse." Changing the metaphor, his lordship said, in reply to Crispien's pressing appeals, that "the Italian Government will have Tripoli, but the sportsman who wants to shoot his stag must wait until it comes well within the range of his gun, so that it does not escape, even if wounded." Italy has, however, not had the requisite patience of the sporting stalker and has blazed away long before the monarch of the glen came within its range. But we do not know if this was not done with the implicit or explicit consent of another British Foreign Minister. Sir Edward Grey's favourite occupation, which is fishing, demands still greater patience.

It is only too clear that the Powers, and specially France and Great Britain, had assured Italy of the reversion of Libya to her in return for her non-interference in Morocco, where in the nineties she had been showing some activity of a more or less anti-French character. Great Britain could not have been a mere Rodrigo to the lago of France, and there is every likelihood of a similar non-interference having been purchased in Egypt. All this was done, in the first instance, in December 1901, when assurances were exchanged between France and Italy. Since then, as Sir Thomas Barclay proves, Italy has constantly watched over the two Turkish Provinces with a sort of jealous suspicion. The Giornale d'Italia of 24th September 1906, complained of the progressive French assimilation of all the routes of traffic from Tripolitana inwards on which the future prosperity of the country depends. "It will result," says this paper, "when the time comes to keep engagements entered into with us on the subject of Tripolitana, in our getting nothing but a bare bone." This was said apropos of the French occupation of the Oasis of Bilma on the route from Tripoli to Lake Chad, some 300 miles south of the most southern point of Turkish savoy in Tripolitana, and within the French sphere of influence as fixed in the agreement of 1899. In 1908 suspicion of German plans seems to have grown up in Italy, and just before the Turkish Revolution took place Italy pressed on the attention of the Sultan grievances very much like those alleged as grounds of the present war, and the Italian Government even made a naval demonstration and obtained satisfaction of all points, one of them being the recognition of the Italian Post Office they had established under the protection of their warships at Benghazi. In February 1910 attention was called in the Italian Parliament to the encroachment of France on the Tripolitan frontier, as if it were already Italian soil, and still more recently Italy went the length of protesting against the sending, by the Ottoman Government, of military transports to Tripoli. As Sir Thomas well says, this could hardly predispose the Turks to a favourable view of Italian activity in their African Vilayet. Italy's action showed that she openly regarded her interest in Turkish North Africa as one of incipient sovereignty already. No wonder then that when rumour gained currency that Germany was about to lease a port or coaling station in Tripolitana, the Italian Government regarded this as an unjust interference in a territory which the Italians had practically brought under their sovereignty even before it was annexed, just as they have now annexed it even before it has been captured. In view of this history it is amusing to read Dr. Dillon's defence of the Italians and especially of Signor Tittoni, who, in 1905, considered the protectorate by Italy of Tripoli as a sine qua non "for the maintenance of the equilibrium in the Mediterranean."

Dr. Dillon wrote in the November issue of the Contemporary Review that "for the time being all that he asked the Porte to grant to his countrymen in the African Vilayet was encouragement and furtherance for their commercial and industrial enterprise. Had this been accorded, Italy and Turkey might not have been at war." We wonder whether Dr. Dillon has ever smiled or laughed in his life and if so, whether his risible faculty is fully maintained to-day. For, surely, it is highly diverting to hear anyone talking of encouraging and furthering Italian commercial and industrial enterprise "for the time being" in order to prevent a war which gives to Turkey a better chance of protecting her territory than the peace beloved of Dr. Dillon and Signor Tittoni. Sir Thomas Barclay, who has no undue leanings towards the Young "Turks," concludes the chapter on "Italy's real case" by saying that, this may explain Italy's resort to form unprecedented by peaceful negotiations, but it does not exonerate her from the guilt of unprovoked aggression or exempt her from the duty of fully indemnifying Turkey and adjusting her legal position with reference to the other parties to the treaties of 1856 and 1878. He is of opinion that "tacit acquiescence by the co-contracting Powers is a sort of licence to others to commit further breaches, and this can only foster that spirit of distrust and unrest among nations which is at the root of the present disastrous competition in military and naval expense." But we do not see what good it would do to Turkey or to the world at large if the Powers "provoked" a post factum legalisation of Italy's action, as Russia's violation of the Black Sea clauses of the treaty of 1856 had been legalised in 1871. What good will it do if, in the words of Sir Thomas Barclay, the Powers "accept the inevitable," and, as he hopes, "re-affirm the sanctity of treaties?" This is the most curious make-believe that we have come across, and it shows that even Sir Thomas Barclay is more anxious for the shadow than for the reality. Sir Thomas Barclay's love of peace and justice is more anæmic than full-blooded, and we doubt if such pleas for the sanctity of treaties would result in much practical good. It is not of justice for the sake of justice or of peace for the love of peace that Sir Thomas is an advocate, but even the less solid foundation of expediency cannot be altogether disposed, and possibly the more commercial-minded amongst the Britons would find much food for thought in the following passage from the introduction. We, however, trust that England is something more than a nation of shopkeepers, and that not only those issues will move an average Briton which touch his purse. Sir Thomas Barclay says:—

Among these (the questions arising out of the war) is one of paramount and permanent importance to this country's interests throughout the world, and on which it is right to stimulate criticism to an attitude of searching and promising energy, namely, that treaty engagements shall be respected and that public opinion shall not be lulled into indifference by humanitarian assurances which at the first contact with concrete situations are swept into the back ground as mere pious wishes. The sanctity of treaties and good faith among nations is not merely a theoretical or moral proposition. It is the very foundation of that international stability on which the calculations, public and private, of whole nations are based. Financial and industrial markets alike are disturbed by the mere rumour of an international difference between European Powers, and the restoration of confidence means that the Powers in question have come to some compromise by a treaty which they will both scrupulously respect. If this is not the idea of the parties to a treaty, and there is a tacit reservation that either may violate any inconvenient clauses of it, as soon as international or foreign complications interfere with the other party's ability to enforce respect for them, we revert to a state of international chaos—a chaos in which the possibility that war without premonitory symptoms, without real grievances, on any trumped-up provocation, may break out, upset the markets, baffle the calculations of merchants and manufacturers, and involve whole industrial populations in that state of distrust and uncertainty as to the immediate future which necessarily follows every disturbance of international peace. Peace is the greatest interest of an industrial proletariat, because it stands for stable markets, and on stable markets depend the contracts ahead which stand for whatever security of future there is in manufacturing communities. The present war, whatever outcome there may be, whatever toll or expense understanding industrial States may have obtained into with the agreement, it is to be hoped, will be regarded as an exception in the history of an age which prizes civilization, humanity and social progress, and in which there will be no work of war as well as no war for its own sake. It is to be hoped that the new world will be the stage of political stability, domestic harmony, and international co-operation.

We have not the same profound faith in the good that has already been done by the Hague Conferences that Sir Thomas Barclay has, and we are not disposed to agree with him that one thing at least which the Hague Conferences have done is "to make the treaty of peace a final closing up of all difficulties and leave as little as possible for permanent resentment or revenge." The instances of the treaty which terminated the Hispano-American War and the Treaty of Portsmouth which settled the titanic struggle between Russia and Japan, and a comparison of these with the settlement of the Franco-German War are not very convincing, because it is not the spirit of magnanimity but of competition, that is often cruel, which seems to actuate the Powers to-day. If anything is characteristic of some at least of those who cry down war in time of peace and disturb the peace themselves, it is the action of Signor Moneta, the leader of the Peace Movement in Italy, and one of the laureates of the Nobel Peace Prize, who justifies the brigandage of his country and writes in the Vita Internazionale that, "the energy and rapidity of action evidenced by the Government is praiseworthy."

Sir Thomas Barclay draws attention to the fact that "from the first notice of the existence of any grievances to the declaration of war the interval was exactly five days," and says that only on one previous occasion, namely, that of the outbreak of the Franco-German War, did anything occur in our time resembling the present war as regards precipitation. It is also worth noting that with regard to the arbitration agreement concluded by most of the powers, they with one exception, have excluded from their operation matters affecting their "vital interests" or "national honour." And when the Marquis di Giuliano sent his ultimatum to Turkey, he took care to state that the issue between his country and Turkey constituted "so far as Italy is concerned a vital interest of the very first order." This, says Sir Thomas, was evidently intended to enable his Government to meet any suggestions as to arbitration. But, as he points out, by an odd coincidence, Italy happens to be the one State which has thus far had the courage to enter into a treaty undertaking to submit to arbitration all differences, whatever their nature, between the parties, without the customary exception of "vital interests" and "national honour." He refers to the treaty which Italy concluded with Argentina and which seemed, during the Hague Conference of 1907, to have been intended to serve as an example to others. Here we have an Italian laureate of peace attesting an unprovoked and unrighteous war, and the Italian nation, that meant to be a model to others, falling even below the low standard of international morality of other European nations.

Dacca University.

GENERAL DEPARTMENT—EDUCATION.

Darjeeling, the 27th May 1912.

RESOLUTION NO. 567 T.—G.

READ—

A letter from the Government of India, Department of Education, No. 811, dated the 4th April 1912.

In the letter appended to this Resolution, the Government of India have announced the decision that a University shall be established at Dacca to serve as an example and test of a teaching and residential institution for higher education, and to afford some relief to the University of Calcutta in the discharge of the immense and growing volume of business with which it is called upon to deal.

1. The Governor in Council fully endorses the tribute paid by the Government of India to the high traditions of the Calcutta University, which are worthily maintained under its present progressive administration. The many years of earnest endeavour and useful work which stand to the credit of the University amply justify the esteem and regard in which it is held by the educated classes of Bengal. No scheme likely to diminish the influence or to injure the reputation of the Calcutta University would therefore commend itself to the Government. But future progress will not be commensurate with past achievement, unless full account is taken of the altered conditions which result from the great expansion of higher education in India and from the development of modern educational ideals. A stage of progress has been reached which requires both fresh development in the activities of the existing Universities and the creation of new centres of University study and research.

2. It is a subject of legitimate pride and satisfaction that the Government of India should select Bengal as the Province in which the first new teaching and residential University is to be founded, and it appears to the Governor in Council that no locality more suitable than Dacca could have been selected for the purpose. The city is already an educational centre of great and rapidly growing influence; it lies in an area which is renowned for the intelligence and educational activity of its Hindu population; and it is an important Mohammedan centre. Moreover, spacious sites and commodious buildings are available, which will render it possible to establish a teaching and residential University at a comparatively small capital cost.

4. The experiment will thus be made in very favourable conditions. In order that these may be utilized to the best advantage and that the scheme may be brought to a successful issue, it is essential that it should be framed with the most deliberate care, and that the fullest opportunity should be afforded to all who are interested in higher education to express their views and to proffer their advice. The Governor in Council has considered carefully the manner in which these objects may best be achieved, and has decided to entrust the framing of the scheme to a strong and representative Committee, which will in due course submit a report to the Local Government. This report will be published and circulated for comment and advice. After full consideration of the suggestions received, the Governor in Council will make such amendments as may appear necessary, and will then submit to the Government of India the scheme called for in paragraph 9 of their letter.

5. In pursuance of the plan outlined in the previous paragraph, the Governor in Council is pleased to appoint the following gentlemen to form a Committee for the purpose of framing a scheme for the establishment of a University at Dacca.—

R. Nathan, Esq., C.S.I., C.I.E., President.

G.W. Kuchler, Esq., C.I.E., M.A., Director of Public Instruction, Bengal.

Dr. Rash Behary Ghosh, C.S.I., C.I.E., D.L., Vakil, High Court, Calcutta.

Nawab Sayid Nawab Ali Chaudhury, Khan Bahadur of Dhanbari, Mymensingh District.

Nawab Seraj-ul-Islam, Vakil, High Court, Calcutta.

Babu Ananda Chandra Ray of Dacca.

Mohamed Ali, Esq., Syndic of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh.

H.R. James, Esq., M.A., Principal, Presidency College, Calcutta.

W.A.J. Archibald, Esq., M.A., LL.B., Principal, Dacca College.

Mahamahopadhyaya Satish Chandra Acharya, Bidyabhusan, M.A., PH.D., M.R.A.S. Principal, Sanskrit College, Calcutta.

Dr. Brajendranath Seal, M.A., PH.D., Principal, Victoria College, Cooch Behar.

Babu Lalit Kumar Chatterji, M.A., Principal, Jagannath College, Dacca.

C.W. Peake, Esq., M.A., Professor, Presidency College, Calcutta.

Shams-ul-ulama Abu Nasar Muhammad Wahid, M.A., Superintendent, Dacca Madrasa.

Mr. D. S. Fraser, I.C.S., is appointed Secretary to the Committee.

6. The Hon'ble Justice Sir Asutosh Mukharji, Kt, C.S.I., M.A., D.L., Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, has kindly consented to advise the Committee on the problems which they are called upon to consider, and the Governor in Council trusts that they will take full advantage of the opportunity thus afforded to them of benefiting from his unrivalled experience in the conduct of University affairs.

7. The new University will be of the teaching and residential and not of the federal type. It should, to use the words of the Government of India, bind together the colleges of the city, but it should not include any college which is beyond the limits of the town. The object of the scheme being to diffuse the benefits of higher education, it must not involve any such additional cost to the students as would discourage them from taking full advantage of the facilities which will be offered. Subject to these instructions, the Governor in Council desires to leave full latitude to the Committee in framing their recommendations. Their report must be of the complete character which the instructions contained in paragraph 9 of the Government of India letter require, and must be accompanied by a financial estimate sufficiently detailed to enable the scheme to be laid before the Secretary of State. The Committee are authorized to consult any authorities whose assistance they may need, and the Governor in Council trusts that all persons whose help may be thus invoked will be willing to afford it.

By order of the Governor of Bengal in Council.

J. H. KERR,

Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

No. 811, dated Simla, the 4th April 1902.

From—The Hon'ble Mr H. Sharp, C.I.E., Joint Secretary to the Government of India, Department of Education.

To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, General (Education) Department.

I am directed to address you on the subject of a proposed University in Dacca.

2. It has long been recognized that the federal type of university which has been implanted in India, though convenient at the outset by reason of the paucity of institutions and their situation at long distances from one another, contains radical defects. Among these may be cited the want of corporate university life and the growth of external examinations. The Government of India have also observed with concern the unwieldy dimensions to which the federal universities in India have grown, and they foresee that the natural expansion and increase of colleges and of secondary schools will tend to aggravate the evils which the present state of things cannot but produce—namely, imperfect supervision, monotonous uniform curricula and methods of instruction, a mechanical system of examinations and the absence of oral tests.

3. The Calcutta University has 52 affiliated colleges in which are enrolled 13,375 students. Within the provinces which it serves, there are also over 600 recognized high schools for boys with over 150,000 male pupils. During the past year the pupils and students examined by the University in various standards ranging from the Matriculation to the Mastership of Arts, etc., was over 14,460. These figures offer a striking contrast to those in the universities in other countries. Oxford, Cambridge and Edinburgh each possess a total of between three and four thousand students. The Glasgow University has between two to three thousands pupils. Manchester 1,554 students, the University of Wales 1,703. The numbers in the other English Universities appear to be less than 1,000 in each. In Germany, Munich and Leipzig are large universities with over 4,000 students. Vienna has nearly 10,000, and Naples and Rome respectively, over five and two thousand. The numbers in other universities of Germany, Austria and Italy are comparatively small.

4. While the federal university in India retains its present position, the attention of its authorities cannot fail to be engrossed by the supervision and examination of the vast body of federated institutions. University teaching and the development of higher study and research (which form an integral part of the duties of a university) cannot obtain the financial support and the energies which they deserve. A due representation of the various portions of the country in which a higher standard of literacy is springing up and of which the educational needs are assuming larger proportions and local characteristics) cannot be ensured upon the councils of a single examining body. The inspection of numerous and distant colleges is too great a strain upon the University Inspector and the Professors or other educationists whose services are utilised by the Syndicate on this behalf. Yet, without regular inspection the standards demand by the University at the time of affiliation may easily be departed from. Above all, it is difficult to foster among students a reverence for a central institution and a loyalty to its ideals when that institution is remote and impersonal.

5. The recent history of universities in Europe confirms the necessity for circumscribing their limits in India, and the desirability of forming more numerous centres. The inadequacy of existing systems to meet the local circumstances and the severe strain imposed by increasing numbers upon the Calcutta University were urged in 1906 as reasons for the establishment of a university at Allahabad. The argument of numbers is far stronger to-day. The Government of India consider the creation of new universities an important factor in educational progress. It is eminently desirable that these should be, where possible, of the teaching and residential type, binding together the colleges of a single town or a single circumscribed area.

6. Dacca presents itself as a very suitable centre for a new university of this type. The town contains four colleges, as well as high schools and educational institutions of other kinds. The residential system in colleges, in order to be fully effective, should be preceded by a residential high school system. And it is believed that this is not unattainable at Dacca. Though the educational interests of the place are large, there is no representative of Eastern Bengal and Assam on the Calcutta Syndicate. Under the regulations such representation appears to be impossible. Even were it rendered possible, the regular attendance of one or more members from Eastern Bengal could never be secured at the numerous Syndicate meetings which the overburdened responsibility of the university at present renders necessary.

7. Furthermore, the Hindu middle-class population of Eastern Bengal is characterized by a particularly high level of intelligence. A separate and accessible centre appears to be clearly called for in order that the educational progressiveness of these districts may be encouraged, full scope afforded to the intellectual activities of their people, and the opportunity for advanced studies placed in their midst. While, until the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal have a university nearer to their doors, in the guidance of which they can have a voice (there are at present only 6 Muhammadans on the Calcutta University Senate of 100), and in which there may perhaps be a Faculty of Islamic studies, there seems but little chance of a large access of Muhammadan students to the college classes.

8. The Governor-General in Council has accordingly decided that a teaching and residential university shall be established at Dacca. This will, in the first place, serve as an example and a test of the new type of university indicated above. In the second place, it will afford some relief, though only to a limited extent, to the present congested state of the Calcutta University. The Governor-

General in Council appreciates highly the excellent work done by the Calcutta University in the past; and he recognizes that notwithstanding the difficulty of increasing numbers, it continues to maintain its high traditions. But if its welfare in the future is to rest assured,—if above all it is to assume its proper place in the guidance and propagation of higher studies,—it is essential that it should find some relief from its present congestion.

9. The Government of India accordingly request that, with the permission of His Excellency the Governor in Council, they may be favoured with the views of the Local Government in this matter and with a complete scheme embracing proposals for the constitution of the Senate and the other controlling authorities of the university, the lines on which regulations and courses should be framed, and a financial estimate. I am to request that, with the permission of the Governor in Council, the financial estimate may be sufficiently full to enable the scheme to be laid before the Secretary of State, who has approved in principle of the establishment of a University at Dacca but has reserved judgment as to the details of any scheme that may be laid before him. As regards a residential system for the schools of the city, a separate communication will be issued.

10. From the allotments made this year the Government of India have decided to make a recurring grant of Rs. 45,000 for the new university, and a non-recurring grant of Rs. 10,00,000 for the initial expenses of the university and for a full residential scheme for the students and pupils of colleges and high schools in Dacca city. No provision has been made in your budget estimate for 1912-13 for either of these grants, but an assignment from Imperial to Provincial will be made through the Land Revenue head after the 1st April 1912 (and when the schemes have been considered by the Government of India); and any necessary addition to the budget grant will be sanctioned during the course of the year.

—The Calcutta Gazette.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND.

Through Mohamed Husain, Esq., Asansole—	Rs	A.	P.
Maulvi Mohd. Husain, Esq. ...	10	0	0
Messrs Md. Sharfuddin, Sardar Sheikh Bqar Ali, Sheikh Jagan Mian, Abdus Samed, and Abdul Hamid, Rs. 5 each ...	25	0	0
Messrs. Sardar Dost Mohd. Khan, Afzal Husain, and Jalal Mia, Rs 2 each ...	0	0	0
Mingroo Mia, Korchwan, Rahman Ali Bakhsh, Markat Ali, Mosahib Ali, Panchkouri Mia, Mohd. Azam Sahib, Maulana Md Hanif, Md. Din, Munshi Mia Rafiq, Mutroo Mia, Mohd. Din, Abdul Gan, Md. Osman, Md Hashim, Abdul Gani Khalifa, Md. Ibrahim, Rafau Mia, Ramzan Mistry, Bakar Ali, Lahu, Surnali, of Ismail, Surnali, Dukandar Reyaz Ali, Haji Dahoo, Sheikh Imaman, Mahomed Ibrahim Kashmiri, Khawja, Kashdir, Nazir Ali Khan, Re. 1 each ...	38	0	0
Minor Subscriptions ...	12	10	0
Hamud Jan Khan Sahib, Muradabad ...	1	0	0
M. Nawab Ali, Esq., Barabanki ...	4	15	0
Miraj Din, Esq., Moga ...	2	0	0
S. Azmatulla, Esq., Tanjore ...	10	0	0
Amount received during the week ...	103	9	0
Amount previously acknowledged ...	10,866	2	0
TOTAL RS. ...	10,969	11	0

Anecdote.

THE Rev. A. H. Stanton, who has just entered upon his fiftieth year as curate of St. Alban's, Holborn, tells this amusing anecdote:—

A Visitor to St. Alban's having confessed that he liked the service, but objected to the incense, Father Stanton gravely remarked:—

"I am very sorry, my friend."

"Why?" asked the stranger.

"Well, you see, there are only two odours in the next world—incense and brimstone—and you will have to choose between them."

Persia.

News of the Week.

News received from the Perso-Afghan border shows that such Afghan encroachments as have occurred are in the district north of Seistan, where the boundary has not been demarcated.

The Governor of Kerman has defeated the rebels.

A telegram from Salar-ed-Dowleh is published in St. Petersburg in a semi-official manner. Salar-ed-Dowleh announces that he has proposed that the Regent should hold a conference consisting of the Representatives of the court, cabinet, army and the tribes for the purpose of finding a solution of the present calamitous situation. Salar-ed-Dowleh undertakes to abide by the result of the Conference, but says that if his proposal is rejected he will assume the offensive with his hundred and fifty thousand followers.

The Muhammadans of Panipat assembled in a public meeting in Inatabara Kalan to express their deep sorrow and indignation at the cruel and barbarous action of the Russians at Meshed and bombardment of the holy tomb of the 8th Imam. It was resolved to send a telegram to H.E. the Viceroy.

A serious conflict has occurred on the Turco-Persian frontier. Four hundred Turkish horsemen invaded Persian territory at Kotour, near Urumiah, and encountered Persians. A number were killed, and prisoners were taken on both sides.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, May 5.

Two hundred armed Afghans have crossed the Persian border near Yezdun and a larger incursion is said to be preparing.

A Government victory over the forces of Mujallid-es-Sultan is reported from Hamadan.

Lord Lamington has arrived here.

Teheran May 8

In a conversation to-day Lord Lamington said that he welcomed the British decision to withdraw the extra Consular guards from Shiraz and Ispahan at the earliest opportunity. He considered it of the utmost importance that as soon as satisfaction for the attack on Consul Smart had been obtained these troops should be removed. The position in the South was one of extreme difficulty, but Consular guards were no solution.

The situation created by Prince Firman Firman's defeat, though not unexpected, is serious. Yezrem left to-day to take command at Hamadan, but unless he rallies the beaten forces the capital may be exposed once more to the pretender's advance. The continued halt of the ex-Shah at Odessa also causes uneasiness.

The Government has applied to the British and Russian Legations for another small financial advance. The request is receiving consideration.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

We have received from a correspondent recently at Meshed the following account of the now notorious bombardment of the mosque of Imam Riza by the Russian force of occupation:—

Since Saturday (30th March) every Muhammadan has been in full mourning. It was on that day that the world witnessed the most inhuman behaviour of the Russians towards Islam. The holy Imam's Shrine, which is situated in the centre of the town, with a mass of people in it, was suddenly bombarded by the Russians. Hundreds of human beings—men, women and children—met their deaths on the spot. The shrine and the adjoining mosque, after being turned into ruins, were used in the worst manner as a stable for horses. The Imam's property—precious stones, ancient work, and such like valuable articles, costing an enormous sum—was looted, but afterwards a document was obtained at the point of the bayonet from the chiefs of the shrine saying that nothing had been touched. There was no reason for Russians to take such action.

The following details will explain the matter. Some three months ago a Russian expedition of about 2,000 men with artillery and a big supply of ammunition reached Meshed with the intention, as it proved, to create disturbances in this peaceful province. Immediately after the arrival of this expedition the Russians set to work and started intrigues. In the first instance they caused the suspension of local papers; they were also successful in organising indirectly a paid party of rebels against the present Government. The leader of the party, Yousoff Khan, a Russian spy and a notorious reactionary, took fast (sanctuary) with his followers in the Shrine of Imam Riza, saying they did not want any law or Constitution.

There the rebels began disturbances. The local authorities were ordered by the Central Government to use force and expel the rebels from the shrine, but they were trying to get over the difficulty peacefully and make such an arrangement as to avoid any collision with the Russians, but in this they unfortunately failed. The situation grew worse and worse every day, and at last circumstances made the Governor-General and other officials resign. The bazaars were now closed and business was at a standstill. A few days after the resignation of the officials, that is to say on last Saturday, at about 5 P.M. the Russians opened fire on the shrine and the Gohar-Shad Mosque. The bombardment lasted three full hours. The number of killed and wounded has been estimated at between two and four hundred, all innocent, and chiefly pilgrims, who had come from thousands of miles to pay respect to their holy Imam and offer their prayers.

But what became of the rebels and why they were not injured or arrested is a mystery to be solved. The town is now entirely in the hands of the Russians.

An official denial has been given to the charge that the Persian Government was shirking the new elections for the Mejliss and the re-assembling of Parliament. The government on the contrary fully intends to order the elections, but it will do so on a method of its own. By experience it has been found that extreme democrats of mischievous opinions manage to win the votes of constituencies and to get returned to the Mejliss. Politicians of this class have done much to embroil Persia with Great Britain and Russia, and it is proposed that during the coming elections these men should be arrested and kept in a safe place, not to be released until the elections are over and Parliament is duly constituted without them. Some of us may admire Persian wisdom as displayed in this fashion and think that a similar process if applied to some of our own political notoriety-seekers would do no great amount of harm.

(THE "MORNING POST.")

The Councillor of the Persian Legation informs Reuter's Agency that the Persian Government is resolved to take the earliest opportunity to re-assemble Parliament and with that end to hold the necessary elections. At the same time the Persian Government recognises the fact that much of the late trouble with Great Britain and Russia and the ensuing political difficulties and Cabinet crises were due to the presence in the Mejliss of certain extreme Democrats, whose actions were not consonant with patriotism, at a time when Persia desired to be on the friendliest terms with Great Britain and Russia, and when the united action of all parties was of urgent necessity. Before ordering the elections, therefore, it is considered necessary for the future welfare of Persia and in the interest of good relations with foreign Powers that every precaution be taken to ensure that there shall be no repetition of the previous difficulties. The Government is determined that during the elections no undesirable element shall be in the country or shall be represented in Parliament. The Government is not opposed to the Democratic Party, which will be freely represented, but it is opposed to the few extremists of that party. After the elections these extremists will be released and free to go where they like. The Government also intends to create a Senate in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

The Trans-Persian Railway.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—I have been much struck with the well-informed, able and impartial manner in which the Near East has during the year of its existence discussed the momentous problems embraced under its title. One of these questions will soon come to the front, and will deserve the close attention of all patriotic Englishmen. I refer to the projected scheme of the Trans-Persian Railway. People in England seem to be either unconscious of the existence of such a project or indifferent to its nature. And yet it may have vital consequences, not merely for Persia, but for British dominion in Asia. I counsel everyone to follow the development of the matter closely in the pages of the Near East.

CURZON OF KEDLESTON

1, Carlton House Terrace, S. W., 26th April 1912

The Troubles of Persia.

Pre-occupations nearer home have caused the affairs of the Middle East to receive scant attention of late. We fear that in the interval they have shown few signs of improvement. All that can be said of Persia during the last few weeks is that, if things are not much better than they were, at least they are no worse. At Teheran the most depressing feature of the situation is that the evolution of a strong and stable Government is still a matter of desire rather than achievement. The REGENT, whose persistent anxiety to leave for Europe is not the least perplexing complication of the moment, has announced his intention to summon a Mejliss. But it will be a small Mejliss, drawn only from the capital and the peaceful provinces. As all the prospective members who are likely to be contentious are being thrust into goal, we may assume that it will also be a tractable Mejliss; but the assumption implies no approval of summary arrests for which good reasons appear to be lacking. Away in Khorasan a Russian force, hastily called for, has felt compelled to bombard the sacred shrine of Imam Riza at Meshed in its efforts to purge the mosque of disorderly agitators.

The bombardment has caused a painful impression, which we share. The group of structures of which the shrine formed the centre was "the glory of the Shia world," and photographs now published in London indicate that it has been badly damaged. This is not a case in which political friendship should prevent us from regretting that the reverence expected from all civilized peoples towards ancient and historical buildings was not shown by the Russian officers at Meshed. The necessity for repressing disorder seems to have been clear, but when troops were so plentiful they should not have required the aid of Maxims in an innermost shrine venerated by half Islam. In Western Persia Salar-ed-Dowleh, the brother of the ex-Shah, is still trying to carve out a kingdom for himself. His rule will doubtless be brief and inglorious, but it is by no means clear that the hesitating march of Prince Firman Firma upon Kermanshah will bring about his expulsion. The small Anglo-Russian loan has enabled the Swedish officers at Shiraz to begin the work of opening the southern roads, but it is too early to estimate their chances of success. The turbulent Kashgais tribe has changed its leader, and there has been an open quarrel between the Sheikh of Mohammerah and the Bakhtians, which is now being composed.

Such is a rapid survey of recent occurrences in Persia, and it does not contain many elements of hopefulness. For Great Britain the chief immediate interest lies in the possibility of a restoration of order in the south. The Swedish officers are capable and courageous men, but until they are backed by a strong central Government their task must remain exceedingly difficult. In his recent speech at the close of the Session in Calcutta, Lord Hardinge of Penshurst spoke of the likelihood of direct negotiations with the southern tribes, but the suggestion has since been dropped in the hope that Persia may be able to do the work herself. The only form of negotiation likely to be acceptable to the tribesmen would be an offer to subsidize them to guard the roads instead of ranging them in search of loot. Some adaptation of the practice of tribal subsidies upon the North-West Frontier of India would have to be devised. There are, however, several manifest hindrances. The chief obstacle is that, however carefully the British Government consulted the susceptibilities of the Teheran Ministry direct relations with the tribesmen would impair the authority of the Persian Administration. As our great object is to support and encourage Persian control, we must be chary of doing anything which might weaken it. Again, having decided to give the Swedish officers all the assistance in our power, we cannot begin by launching a rival scheme on our own account. The time is in any case not propitious, for the tribesmen are migratory in summer, and the dispute about the headship of the Kashgais, which is not yet finally settled, makes it almost impossible to establish solid relations with the most powerful tribe of all.

However impatient we may be to see order restored in the south it must be evident that the best course to pursue is to wait a little longer and give the Swedish officers their chance. Though the picture of Persia we have drawn is somewhat gloomy, there are touches of relief to be added. The only really awkward new complication is the rebellion raised by Salar-ed-Dowleh. The rising remains local in character, the new aspirant to the Throne makes little progress, and his disappearance should not be long delayed. Then it has to be remembered that, if the Teheran Government is weak, it is not defiant, and shows every disposition to listen to good advice. The rescript summoning a new Mejlis is at least evidence that a restoration of ordered government is sought, though we wish it had not been accompanied by indiscriminate arrests. While many people are inclined to condemn British policy in Persia because, in their view, it is not sufficiently strenuous, they do not, as a rule, offer any very practical suggestions for its improvement. We are sometimes urged to send military expeditions to Southern Persia in the vague hope of evolving order out of chaos. Those who make these heroic proposals seem to have no conception of their probable magnitude. Our desire is to give Persia time and opportunity to regenerate herself. A large British expedition, seeking to chastise elusive tribesmen in the South, would incidentally destroy all hope of a stable government at Teheran. On the other hand, there is a disposition in some quarters to condemn the British authorities because a small number of troops have been sent, not to undertake military operations, but to protect the lives of British subjects. The answer is that these small increases were necessary, and that we have already notified to the Teheran authorities our intention of withdrawing the additional troops as soon as they have established control in the south. Apart from the recent unfortunate necessity for sending a force to Meshed, Russia has already been reducing her troops in Northern Persia. The Policy of Russia and Great Britain has been identical, and will remain so. Finally, the British Government are reproached because it is alleged, their firm adherence to the principles of the Anglo-Russian Convention has in some mysterious and undisclosed manner prevented Persia from rehabilitating herself. The best answer to this allegation was given by Lord Hardinge of Calcutta. He remarked that, had it not been for the Convention, Persia would probably not be in existence to-day.—The Times.

Morocco.

News of the Week.

Forty-eight natives condemned to death by the court-martial in connection with the recent disorders were executed at Fez on the morning of the 23rd May. The greatest secrecy was observed and the most rigorous precautions taken against disturbances.

General Lyautey, the new Resident-General, entered Fez on the 24th May and was greeted with an imposing display of force. General Lyautey, in a speech in Fez, said he was determined to maintain the sovereignty of the Sultan and respect for the customs and religion of Mussalmans.

The fermentation in Morocco continues. The tribesmen made a determined combined night attack on Fez at three points and were driven off after eleven hours' fighting. Some of the enemy succeeded in entering the city. A number of the defenders were wounded. The French Minister of War has ordered the immediate despatch of reinforcements to Fez.

Another attack on Fez on the morning of the 27th May was repulsed by the artillery. Some tribesmen again entered the city. One French officer was killed and thirty men killed and wounded. The enemy's casualties were very heavy.

Rumours, current on the 29th May, of the wholesale massacre of Europeans in Fez have been dispelled by a message from General Lyautey stating that on the 27th May and the following night, the Berbers returned to the walls of Fez and kept up an incessant fire. It was thus impossible for the inhabitants to leave the town or mount the ramparts, but no attack was actually made on the town.

A message to the Times from Tangier states that twenty thousand rebels are besieging Fez. The French garrison numbers six thousand. The situation is grave.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 2.

THERE is no change in the situation at Fez. According to the Temps, the proclamation of the state of siege has produced a considerable impression on the natives, though the populace, despite the effort of the Sheikhs and Ulemas, remains as hostile as ever towards the French and regards the Sultan as a prisoner whom they are anxious to remove. It is considered at Fez that the departure of the Sultan for Rabat would cause troubles more serious than the recent revolt.

Two circumstances, however, make for the maintenance of order. In the first place, the Sultan in his proclamation to the troops censures the conduct of the mutinous troops and declares that he is acting hand in hand with the French, and that the soldiers who serve him serve France as well, while the Ulemas have in the mosques exhorted the people to be wise, announcing that "the mutineers and pillagers have committed a crime against God in attacking Europeans who were their guests and lived in peace. The duty of Mussalmans is to fight for them as for their own children." In the second place, the Moroccans have begun to realise the strength of France, and in order to maintain this impression the Europeans in Fez consider that the punishment of the mutineers should be not only effective but immediate.

A telegram to the Temps from Fez states that as a recent meeting the Beni Warain, Beni Sadden, Esul, Branes, and Riato decided to march on Fez. It is reported that two large harbas are being formed in the valley of the Wed Innauen, the one to march immediately on Fez, the other on Sefru, but it is possible that the heavy rain may damp the ardour of the tribes.

The Sussex Daily News to-day publishes a letter from Mrs. McLeod, wife of the British Consul at Fez, describing the scene in the Moorish capital during the recent mutiny and massacre. Mrs. McLeod says "At drill the soldiers were told by the French officers that their pay, which had been sent them without food, would be reduced to fourpence a day with food, and they were to carry heavier weights. The soldiers rebelled, and the officers said that those who were not content were to be put in chains. The fat was now in the fire, and there was a general massacre. Soldiers ran hither and thither, and did for their officers. They entered houses where they knew Christians were living, and killed them. Afterwards they paraded the streets with the heads. The mob then joined in the fray, and thousands were let loose. The prisons were all flung open, and the prisoners escaped. The women went mad and were all dancing and yelling on their roofs for joy, and saying on the soldiers to do more. The noise was terrible. Mr. Smith, our assistant, had a very narrow escape. He had just started up one street to lunch at the hotel, when Mr. McLeod, at that moment having a number of bad news, called him back. At that time the soldiers had broken into the hotel, and had killed several. Everything in the place was stolen. The whole afternoon we did not know what was to happen to us. The riff-raff were outside our house, bent on mischief, carrying huge sticks and guns—just mad. In a house close by they killed four people and wounded a fifth person. The French troops are stationed two miles from the town, and fortunately the rebels had not cut the telegraph wires, so they arrived in the evening. They had had an awful time fighting all the way to Fez. Many were killed, including some officers and a great many were wounded. One regiment marched with no officers, all three of them were killed. There was not sufficient of them to do anything. Three thousand Moorish soldiers had rebelled, so they only guarded the quarter where the Europeans resided. Our house was filled with them, and from our roof they afterwards did a great deal of firing, so you can imagine the noise! We were in great danger all Wednesday evening, for the town was only held by 300 French soldiers. They did wonders. It was a very wet night, and they got soaked to the skin. On Thursday 2,000 French soldiers arrived from Mequinez."

(FROM THE "DAILY MAIL" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Friday.

The Sultan's pride has been deeply wounded by the stories current among his people that he is a prisoner, and he fears that as nominal ruler under a French Protectorate his independence will be greatly restricted.

M. Gaillard, the French Consul at Fez, managed to dissuade the Sultan from abdicating recently, and Mulai Hafid signed the treaty establishing the French Protectorate. He has now poured out his woes to the Matin special correspondent in Morocco. The ruler in affirming his unswerving loyalty to the French, asked:

"Have I not compromised myself as no other Sultan of Morocco has ever done before me? Have I not, contrary to all precedent, eaten at your table? It has been said that I expressed the desire to abdicate. It is true, but after signing the Protectorate treaty did I not have the right to take a rest? Can I be forced to remain a Sultan in perpetuity?"

"Even in my personal relations with certain Kaids, in personal and family questions with certain tribes, I cannot act except through the French authority. I have accepted everything. I was thrown into water with tied hands and now they reproach me for getting wet."

What Mulai Hafid apparently wants to do is to be permitted to go to Rabat and thence to Paris to get into touch with the French Government.

(FROM THE "DAILY MAIL" CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, Friday.

Discussing the "New France" in a leading article entitled "Difficulties of the French Republic," the Berliner Tageblatt warns France that she cannot hope for the friendship of Germany so long as the entente cordiale is maintained or retains its present "anti-German" character. Referring to France's forthcoming troubles in the "peaceful subjugation" of Morocco, the Tageblatt says:

"The new spirit of France has a favourable opportunity for displaying its powers on the soil of Northern Africa. Until 1900 a Franco-German rapprochement was within the realm of possibility. But no such possibility can exist while the entente cordiale lasts.

"Let us leave the French to their old or their new spirit and observe events without taking them too tragically. The German official policy should avoid unnecessary sharpness, but if necessary it should defend the German standpoint without weakness lest the notion takes root in France that 'the new spirit' is making an impression here. The movement, which is principally the creation of a few Paris newspapers, will have so many things in this world—especially in France—soon pass by. Even if it lasts Germany, which is still quite powerful, will happily be in a position, despite the French airmen, to view the situation with equanimity."

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 3.

Long telegrams from Fez to-day tell of Mulai Hafid's depression and of his renewed desire to abdicate. According to the Temps the Sultan is suffering from neurasthenia, which has been aggravated by recent events, especially the mutiny in the capital. He declares that last October M. de Selves, then Foreign Minister, promised that he would be free to reign when he liked and to reside where he chose. As his chief concern appears to be to show that he can still do as he pleases, it is believed that if his wish to go to Rabat is gratified he will cease to talk of abdicating. According to the Temps this evening the French Government, acting on advice received from General Mousser and M. Regnault, is not likely to oppose Mulai Hafid in his intention of journeying to Rabat, where arrangements can be made for him to discuss matters with General Lyautey as soon as the new Resident-General arrives.

The mental crisis through which Mulai Hafid has been passing appears to have reached a climax towards the end of March, just before the arrival of M. Regnault on the mission which ended in the signature of the Protectorate Treaty. The Sultan seems to have felt his position keenly and explained to the French Consul, M. Gaillard, that in view of his having proclaimed himself at Marakesh as opposed to all foreign intrusion he could not remain Sultan under the new regime. He expressed a desire to abdicate in favour of an eight-year-old son, and suggested that El Mokri should act as Regent until that Prince came of age.

M. Gaillard with difficulty persuaded him to await M. Regnault's arrival before taking any irrevocable decision. When M. Regnault arrived the Sultan complained to him of the independent action of the French military authorities, who conducted operations and enforced measures without consulting him. The French envoy took advantage of Mulai Hafid's direct appeal to him, won his confidence by giving him a sympathetic hearing, and after some hesitation on the Sultan's part secured the signature of the Treaty.

The causes of the Sultan's irritability and depression may be inferred from the terms of a conversation which he held a few days ago with a representative of the Matin, to whom he gave audience. He disclaimed all responsibility for the recent mutiny since he had long ago been deprived of all power, especially over the army. Furthermore, he had no means of knowing the temper of the rural population. Some of the askaris had come to him in order to beg for his intercession, but the mutiny broke out before he could take any steps. He was devoted to France, he had invariably done everything that he had been asked to do, and he had always, especially at the time of the Agadir incident, rejected German and Spanish advances. He himself was never consulted even with regard to matters which personally concerned him. He had never complained. "I have put up with everything," he said. "I have been thrown into the water with my hands tied, and now they blame me for getting wet."

As regards the future the Sultan advised the French not to go too fast. The raw material for the Army was excellent, but it was a serious error of judgment to have attempted to stop part of the men's pay for canteen expenses on a scale far in excess of what they were accustomed to spend for food. It was like mulcting any wage-earner in Europe in two-thirds of his earnings and compelling him to take his meals at an expensive hotel. The native troops, if treated with consideration and with respect for their traditions, would do anything and go anywhere. During the siege of Fez last year the French officers had been at their mercy and yet they had done their duty and had died like men. The new Shereefian troops had, perhaps, been formed too hastily and had been recruited without sufficient care. The new French instructors had not invariably been acquainted with the mentality of the askaris. "Be prudent" he added, "and you will have at your disposal the finest troops you can possibly desire."

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 5.

According to a telegram from Casablanca, dated yesterday, a French reconnoitring force of about 500 men which had been sent out from El Maziz, near Mekinez, was attacked on Thursday by Zemmur or Zaer tribesmen, who were ultimately repulsed with heavy loss after a sharp rearguard action. The French casualties numbered seven killed and 30 wounded, including one officer. Four men who are reported missing are believed to be prisoners in the hands of the enemy.

The rising among the tribes, which appears to be spreading from the Sebu to the Muluya, and of which the recent mutiny of Shereefian troops at Fez was a prelude, seems in the first instance to have been provoked by fear that the French wanted either to hold the Sultan prisoner or to convey him out of the country. This theory of the outbreak is confirmed by a Havas message from Fez of Thursday's date, according to which the Ulama and Notables were aggrieved by the failure of the French authorities to keep them informed of the progress of the negotiations with the Sultan which ended in the signature of the Protectorate Treaty. In the circumstances it is considered a miracle that so many Europeans escaped massacre. If events had not been precipitated by adventurous spirits among the native troops, who were burning to plunder the Jewish quarter, the tribes would have entered Fez and not a single European would have escaped. Competent judges believe that there might have been a general rising and they are strongly of opinion that unless the benefits of the French action are speedily made manifest to the population no progress can be made, and the French will find themselves in a dangerous situation.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, May 5.

The Sultan Mulai Hafid, who desired to abdicate before signing the Protectorate Treaty but was dissuaded from doing so, has since the massacre at Fez repeatedly notified the French authorities that he does not wish to remain on the Throne. Although he has been persuaded up to the present to take no definite decision, he has not in any degree relinquished his desire, and the latest Fez news again states that he is making no secret of his intention. Apparently he desires that his son, who is very young, should succeed him under a Regency, but should Mulai Hafid persist in abdicating it is more probable that one of his brothers would be chosen.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 6.

The Prime Minister, M. Poincaré, and the War Minister, M. Millerand, are holding long conferences with General Lyautey on the eve of the new Resident-General's departure for Morocco. It may be inferred that quite apart from questions of general policy in the Protectorate the present military situation is engaging the serious attention of the Government. The Temps learns from Fez that General Moinier has asked for the despatch of three additional battalions to reinforce the French army of occupation. He considers these reinforcements indispensable in order to guard the lines of communication between Fez and Rabat so long as the presence of a large portion of General Moinier's command is required in the capital. It is believed that the reinforcements will be sent out before General Lyautey arrives.

Although the French Government has ostensibly left it to General Moinier and to M. Regnault to decide whether the Sultan's wish to go to Rabat can be gratified without danger, the last word seems still to rest with Mulai Hafid himself. According to persistent accounts the Ministry which was in office last October came to a formal agreement with the Sultan to the effect that he should be left free to abdicate when he pleased and to go where he chose. He wants to go to Rabat because, it is alleged, he does not feel secure at Fez. The objections by the local French authorities to the journey are met by him with a threat to abdicate and "to depart as a simple Shereef." The situation is awkward since if Mulai Hafid were allowed to depart he would not in the present temper of the tribes remain a "simple Shereef" very long. General Moinier and M. Regnault have therefore been compelled to advise their Government that the agreement concluded with the Sultan last October must be carried out. Their joint powers of persuasion may avail to induce Mulai Hafid to await General Lyautey's arrival. If they fail to convince him the journey will presumably have to be undertaken.

The Journal des Debats this evening makes the extraordinary announcement that neither the Prime Minister nor the Director of the Political Department at the Foreign Office had any knowledge of the arrangement made with the Sultan last October. Its existence was disclosed to them by a despatch from Fez announcing Mulai Hafid's intentions. As a letter to the Press by M. de Selves, the Former Foreign Minister, makes clear, nothing was done by him in this matter without the full agreement of the Government to which he belonged. The Prime Minister and the Minister of War, with the concurrence of General Lyautey, have instructed M. Regnault and General Moinier to do their best to dissuade the Sultan from the journey to Rabat and if their efforts prove unavailing to take steps to prevent any regrettable incident on the road. The Debats states that M. Poincaré, M. Millerand, and General Lyautey do not conceal from themselves the inopportune character of the journey, but that the Government's word is formally pledged.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 7.

Ministers met in council under the presidency of M. Fallières at Rambouillet to-day and discussed the situation in Morocco and also the negotiations with Spain. The new Resident-General will embark on the cruiser Jules Ferry at Marseilles to-morrow, and will be accompanied by M. Privat-Deschanel, Director-General of Public Accounts at the Ministry of Finance, who is to study on the spot the ways and means of organizing the finances of Morocco.

The strong French reconnaissance column sent out from Fez to clear the approaches to the capital has failed to get in touch with the rebel tribes and is returning to camp. It is believed that the tribes are gathering their forces and may attempt an attack on the city during the course of the week. Information to hand from French sources in Fez with regard to the temper of the tribes is not reassuring.

A Press controversy has arisen as to the precise bearing and importance of the agreement concluded last October between the French Government and the Sultan upon the strength of which Mulai Hafid claims the right to go to Rabat or to be allowed to abdicate.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 8.

General Lyautey left Paris to-night for Marseilles, where he will embark to-morrow on the cruiser Jules Ferry for Morocco. If, as is reported from Fez to-day, Mulai Hafid, in deference to the representations of M. Regnault and General Moinier, has agreed to postpone his journey to Rabat, the new Resident-General will proceed direct from the coast via Rabat and Mekinez to the capital, which he is expected to reach in about a fortnight's time. A strong escort will be furnished for General Lyautey and these troops will be available for escorting the Sultan to Rabat, if, after General Lyautey's arrival, Mulai Hafid still insists upon making the journey. If this arrangement can be carried out there will not be any necessity to deplete the Fez garrison for escort purposes.

This evening it is announced that during the next fortnight General Moinier will receive the following reinforcements:—One mountain battery, one battalion each of Algerian Tirailleurs, of Zouaves, and of the Foreign Legion, and two squadrons of Chasseurs d'Afrique. Two additional battalions of Senegalese Tirailleurs, which are now being formed at Dakar, will reach Morocco between 20th June and 20th August. In addition, three battalions of Tirailleurs and one battalion of Colonial Infantry, which were shortly due to return home, will remain in the Protectorate until further orders. General Moinier will therefore have at his disposal 29 battalions of Infantry, with an effective strength of 32,000 men.

The troops on the Algero-Moroccan frontier, under the command of General Alix, are to be increased by one battalion to 11,000 men. At the end of last year the total strength of the French Army of Occupation was estimated at 54,000 men.

The Versailles engineers have just sent out to Morocco the first locomotive for the military railway from Casablanca to Rabat. This locomotive, which is of 60 centimetre gauge, is to take the place of the Decauville engine now in use, and seven others of the same type are to be sent out at intervals of a month. The line has been laid as far as the 33rd kilometre. Over 1,000 tons of material and military stores for Morocco will be shipped from Marseilles to-morrow.

The French Press reproduces from German journals accounts of alleged depredations committed on German farms in Morocco by native police under the command of French officers. All that appears to be known here with regard to those charges is a report from Tangier to the effect that a farm called Oulad Bessam, in the territory of the Oulad Bessa tribe, belonging to the native secretary of the German Vice-Consul at Larache, who is described as a partner in the firm of Renschhausen, has been visited by 150 Shereefian police, commanded by two French officers, who are said to have arrested 30 men employed on this farm. Pending the result of an inquiry, which has been instituted by the French Diplomatic Agent at Tangier, it is assumed that the police visited the farm in the course of their search for a number of mutineers who have deserted from the Shereefian menalla at Arbaoua. If any persons have been arrested it will presumably have been on suspicion of harbouring deserters.

At a memorial ceremony which was held yesterday at Fez at the graveside of the French victims of last month's massacre, El Mokri delivered, in the name of the Sultan, a speech deploring their death and reproaching the mutiny. M. Regnault and General Moinier paid tributes to the memory of the dead and proclaimed the unfaltering determination of France to continue the task which she has set herself in Morocco.

Mogador, May 7.

A German subject has been made captive by Moors on the Marakesh road. Excitement is rife among the surrounding tribes and plundering is proceeding outside the gates, though Mogador itself is at present tranquil. Three warships are at anchor off the town.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 9.

General Lyautey sailed from Marseilles for Morocco this evening. The Press is wondering what recommendations the new Resident-General will make when he reaches Fez in two or three weeks' time. Public opinion is already being prepared for a demand for a considerable reinforcement of the French Army of Occupation. But the strength of these reinforcements can only be decided by General Lyautey on the spot. If Mulai Hafid can definitely be reassured with regard to his own position, the Resident-General will be able to devote all his energies to the task of rendering secure the region between Rabat and Fez. As the Sultan has for the time being agreed to remain in the capital, French troops will be employed in patrolling the surrounding country until General Lyautey's arrival.

Growing unrest is reported among the tribes in the neighbourhood of Marakesh. According to a message from Ujda a French column of 3,400 men under General Garadat is encamped at Ffidant on the Muluya, in order to watch the movements of the Beni Warain and other hostile tribes on the left bank of the river. The military preparations in progress at Tauris suggest to French observers that an advance on Taza will be made before long. General Alix, the French Commander on the Algerian frontier, will, doubtless, get his orders from General Lyautey when he meets the Resident-General to-morrow at Oujda. The Shereef of Fez, who is now in France, is said to be anxious to visit Taza in order to induce his uncle, Sidi Ahmed, to make a submission.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

LORD CREWE, replying to the Moslem League regarding the extension of hostilities to the Dardanelles and other places, says he fully appreciates the motives of the representation, but he cannot enter into a discussion of the policy of His Majesty's Government or that of the other Governments concerned. While anxious, by all means in their power, to secure respect for the religious susceptibilities of Indian Moslems, the Government emphatically repeat their disclaimer of the intention to offer advice to the belligerents regarding the sphere or conduct of operations. They believe that this attitude will commend itself to the good sense of Indian Moslems and are confident that they will continue to observe the strict neutrality required of all His Majesty's subjects without distinction.

Diplomatic relations between Turkey and Greece were resumed on the 26th May after being interrupted for eighteen months. The trouble arose over differences regarding Cretan affairs and the appointment of M. Venzelos as Premier.

It is semi-officially stated that Greece and Bulgaria have arrived at a definite understanding which settles all pending religious and political questions and provides for Greco-Bulgarian co-operation in certain matters.

The expulsion of Italians from Asia Minor is proceeding. Up to the present five thousand Italians have been expelled from Smyrna alone. The customs are confiscating Italian merchandise.

At a meeting of the Council of the Bengal Presidency Moslem League held last Sunday evening at 34, Elliott Road, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—1. That the League again records its feeling of indignation at the conduct of Italy, in waging an unjust and iniquitous war without any cause or provocation and for unjustly carrying operations of war into regions which are outside the zone, within which Italy solemnly promised to confine her military operations, and the League is surprised that the European Powers should look unconcerned on this violation of the pledge and the high-handed action of Italy which threatens the peace of the world. 2. That the League urges upon His Majesty's Government as the greatest Muhammadan Power to abandon its passive attitude so long maintained and to take early steps to check this unjust aggression which is daily exasperating more and more the Mussalman subjects of His Majesty.

The following Press communiqué has been issued by the Political Department of the Government of Bengal:—

His Britannic Majesty's Consul at Basra having noticed several cases of persons visiting Mesopotamia from India either without passports or with passports not bearing the Visa of a Turkish Consular authority, the attention of all applicants for passports who contemplate travelling in Turkish territory is again drawn to the following regulations respecting passports in the Turkish Empire:—

(1) Every person traveling to Turkey must be provided with a passport bearing the Visa of a Turkish Consular Officer. Without such passport they may be refused admission to the country. A fresh Visa must be obtained for each journey.

(2) Children under twenty years of age and females may be included in their parents or relatives' passports.

(3) If more than one male adult is included in one passport a Visa fee of 20 piastres silver (three shillings and four pence) is levied for every such adult.

(4) As there is no Turkish Consul at Karachi no fine is levied for a unvised passport, but the Visa fee of 20 piastres silver is levied at Basra.

(5) The fine in the absence of a passport or Visa is 40 piastres silver (six shillings and eight pence).

Regarding the boycott of Italian goods, the Bombay Gazette states on good authority that in the East it has been in force for eight months and continues as severe as ever. There seems no likelihood that there will be complete relief from the present circumstances until the end of the war, if even then, for should the war conclude on terms satisfactory to Turkey, Moslem resentment may dictate a continuance of them. The boycott in India is still, however, only partial. While some Muhammadans refuse to take Italian goods under any circumstances, others content themselves with reducing their purchases to the lowest possible limit. In Persia and Afghanistan the boycott is complete and dealers are demanding certificates of place of origin. The trade in Bombay of Italian goods has been reduced by about 20 per cent. It is estimated that the sale of fez caps has been reduced by 50 per cent. One Bombay firm alone suffered loss to the extent of one lakh of rupees in the past season in fez caps. With the exception of the trade in fez caps, in which no other country has yet proved capable of competing with Italy, there is a distinct possibility that Italian trade may suffer permanent injury from prevailing conditions.

Rs. 90,000 has been collected at Cabul in aid of the Red Crescent Society for the sick and wounded of the Turkish Army at Tripoli. This sum has been received in Bombay by the Agent of the Amir and has been forwarded on to Constantinople by the Turkish Consul-General. The Amir has directed that further collections in aid of the fund shall be made in all parts of his dominions.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD")

THE Mutesarrif of Lemnos has informed the Sublime Porte that he is sending to Constantinople everything washed ashore from the Italian cruiser Vares which sunk off Moudros.

The Milan correspondent of the Daily Chronicle reports that despite the repeated assurances of the Italian Government that no damage whatever had been sustained by any of the ships in the recent attack on the Dardanelles, news is leaking out which tends to show that this statement must be accepted cum grano salis. In addition to the admissions made by a member of the expedition aboard Admiral Viale's flagship as regards the piercing of the Garibaldi's armour-plate in several places, and further admissions as to the damage aboard the Furruio, confirmed by its commander in a published letter, La Sera (Milan) prints an interview of its Catania correspondent with a naval officer belonging to the Garibaldi, who has just been invalided home, in which the officer states that during the attempt to blow up the Turkish war-vessels anchored in the straits at midnight on 18th April two torpedo destroyers, the Ferses and Akrome, did really succeed in penetrating the Dardanelles, but on account of the thick darkness prevailing and the great velocity at which they were travelling, the destroyers came into violent collision and were so badly damaged that they had instantly to withdraw, escorted by others near the entrance. This is the real reason why the attack was abandoned.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, Sunday.

The Minister of War formally denies the report in a London paper that the bombardment of the Dardanelles had caused the death of 300 Turkish soldiers, the wounding of 275, and the destruction of the fortresses. The Minister categorically re-asserts his first announcement that one soldier was killed and one wounded, that one horse was killed, and that the dormitories of the barracks were destroyed, though little damage was done to the fortresses.

Shefiket Pasha offered to authorise a foreign Military Attaché to visit the Dardanelles forts and report upon his inquiries.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD")

Several of our contemporaries, Turkish and others, announced yesterday that Dr. Sandler, correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, was to have been expelled for having sent false information to his paper concerning the Italian attack on the Dardanelles. Some papers even alleged that he had been arrested and subsequently released.

Dr. Sandler requests us to give a formal denial to this news. He had been led into error on the subject of the Turkish losses at the Dardanelles and had telegraphed to the Daily Chronicle in perfectly good faith. As soon as he realised that his good faith had been surprised he expressed his regrets to the authorities and telegraphed a denial to the Chronicle.

There was never any question of Dr. Sandler's arrest or expulsion.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 8.

The Council of Ministers have just decided on the expulsion from the Vilayet of Smyrna and its dependencies of all Italian residents, who are given 15 days in which to leave the country. It will be remembered that the Government has already warned the Powers of its intention to resort to this retaliatory measure in case of an attack on the European or Asiatic provinces and has already resorted to it in the Syrian provinces in consequence of the attack on its ships at Beirut.

As a large proportion of the skilled workmen at Smyrna are Italian subjects, the Council of Ministers has decided that Italian workmen are exempted from the expulsion orders which were issued yesterday. Further exemptions are granted to widows and members of religious orders.

No confirmation whatever has been received of the reported Ottoman success at Rhodes. Italian warships have been sighted off Chios and Sythé.

Rome, May 11.

The correspondent of the Corriere d'Italia at Athens sends the following information as to the Turkish troops in the island of the Aegean Sea.

In Rhodes, in the position to which they retired after the Italian landing, the Turkish forces number 3,000 men. They are well provided with ammunition but other supplies are somewhat scanty.

At Mitylene there are 2,500 Turkish regulars, with six mountain guns and eight machine guns. The volunteers for the defence of the island number, it is said, about 7,000 men.

At Chio there are about 2,000 regular troops, and some hundreds of native volunteers, with two mountain guns and six machine guns. The garrison of Kos amounts to about a hundred regular soldiers and perhaps 1,000 volunteers, but it is believed they have no artillery. In the other islands there are no garrisons.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 6.

In consequence of the difficulty of distinguishing Turkish messages and of bogus information heliographed to the mainland by the Italian landing parties, the Government does not seem to have obtained any very definite information of the state of affairs in the island of Rhodes. According to a message received at the Ministry of War from Major Abdullah Bey, the commander of the local garrison, this afternoon, 11 Italian warships took up position in the bays of Trianta and Phylax, situated respectively west and east of the town of Rhodes, on Saturday morning and shelled the ground immediately behind the town. Two detachments of Infantry and two batteries of Artillery had meanwhile been landed in Phylax Bay. After an engagement in which several Italian officers and soldiers were killed, and one non-commissioned officer and two men were taken prisoners, the Ottoman troops fell back to a position out of the range of the guns of the Italian Fleet.

A later telegram announces that the Italian troops have occupied the town of Rhodes and that the population is returning thither from the hills.

Rome, May 8.

A telegram from Rhodes of to-day's date states that the Italian torpedo-boat destroyer Ostru surprised and took prisoner at Lindos the Vali of Rhodes and two of his secretaries while they were attempting to leave the island. The Vali and his secretaries will be sent to Italy at the first opportunity. Four Turkish officers and 28 regulars have given themselves up to the Italian outposts. — (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Syra, May 8.

The Italians cut the cable last week between Rhodes and Sitia and destroyed the wireless station. The communications of all the Turkish islands with Europe and Asia are now broken.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, May 3.

M. Sazonoff and the Departmental Chiefs of the Foreign Office arrive at Livadia to-morrow to discuss the problem of the Dardanelles.

Of course there is a threat that an indemnity will be demanded from Turkey for the losses owing to the detention of Russian commerce. Another suggestion is that Russia will invite the Powers to an International Conference in order to discuss the entire Ottoman question, on the ground that mediation between the two combatants has now been proved impossible.

Competent students of international politics ridicule the notion of another Berlin Conference, as they do not believe that either England or France would accept the idea.

(FROM "EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Sunday, May 5.

The German and the Austrian Ambassadors have been hurriedly recalled to their respective capitals.

Baron Marschall von Bieberstein started for Berlin yesterday, and the Marquis de Pallavicini will leave at once for Vienna.

The departure of the Ambassadors is quite unexpected and has caused a deep impression in political circles here.

It is generally believed that Germany is about to change her attitude of strict neutrality with regard to the Turco-Italian conflict, owing to the disposition of Turkey to rely on the support and advice of Great Britain.

In diplomatic quarters the view is held that these two Powers of the Triple Alliance are about to take action in the interests of Italy, the third party of the Triple Alliance.

I am informed that it would cause no surprise if the return of the two Ambassadors to Berlin and Vienna were to be followed by a startling coup de théâtre.

The Turkish authorities have not yet been able to begin the work of clearing the mine from the Dardanelles, and it is almost impossible in any case that navigation will be resumed before Saturday next. The trouble arises not from any disposition on the part of Turkey to hinder the work, but from the difficulties caused by the recent storms and the want of necessary equipment for fishing up the mines.

In a message dated 30th April the Uskub correspondent of the Temps announces the passing through the local station of 15 trucks, containing for the most part shrapnel, from Germany, to Salonika and Constantinople. Five days previously two trucks passed the Uskub station with aeroplanes for Constantinople. Altogether, says the correspondent, "Germany has done excellent business since the beginning of the war, no fewer than 200 trucks loaded with arms and ammunition having passed through Uskub station alone from Germany on the way to Turkey."

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 7.

Representatives of the Ottoman Government and the French financial group headed by the Ottoman Bank have initiated a contract whereby the latter obtain the option till 14th April 1913, on a loan to the former of £T.10,000,000 at 4 per cent., of which £T.2,500,000 will be devoted to railway construction and the balance to meeting the deficit on the Budget. The price of issue is not fixed, but will probably be 84. The loan is guaranteed on the unpledged 8 per cent Customs duties for five provinces — namely, Beirut, Salonika, Smyrna, Trebizond, and either Erzerum or Aleppo. The option contract will be definitely signed as soon as the negotiations concerning the railway loan between the Government and the French Société Générale des Chemins de Fer have been concluded.

The £T.2,500,000 to be expended on railway construction form an instalment of the said railway loan, which is spread over a period of several years. As soon as the contract is signed, the Imperial Ottoman Bank will make an advance to the Government of £T.1,500,000 over and above the statutory credit of £T.1,500,000.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

If it were not for the alarms of war (a correspondent in Constantinople writes) the new law recently promulgated by the Sultan relative to the Turkish vilayets or provinces would attract more attention. It is indeed a long step on the path of decentralisation. Each province is now, as regards its fiscal legislation, an entity. It has power to regulate its own taxation, and the most crying evil in the country is the unjust incidence of taxation. Hitherto, the poor peasant has had to pay sometimes six times as much taxes proportionally as the more prosperous town dweller, and the poorest provinces have been the most heavily taxed. The burden borne by Constantinople, for instance, has been trifling compared with that weighing on the Anatolian provinces. Of course, it is one thing to make a law and another to apply it. But the principle is now admitted and sanctioned, and the era of the governor of the province who had bought his place and must recoup himself how he could is over. If the new system should prove workable on more money wrung from the peasants will be sent to Stamboul.

(FROM THE "LEVANT HERALD.")

H. I. M. the Sultan has conferred the silver medal of the Lialet upon Mr. Gordon Ball, the British aviator, who made an ascension during the military review on Accession Day.

According to news from Turkish sources the next demarché of the powers in view of the cessation of hostilities will be made after a meeting of the Ambassadors in Constantinople.

The demarché will be made simultaneously in Rome and Constantinople.

The Ikhtisam, dealing with the rumours concerning the Russian proposal for the calling of an international conference in view of putting an end to the war, says that the British Government is opposed to the calling of a conference.

The Ikhtisam adds that the Sublime Porte would categorically reject any proposal for a conference.

The Occupation of Rhodes.

(BY THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

THE news that General Ameglio with a body of troops has effected a landing on Rhodes Island shows that the Italian Government, in accord with the wishes of the Italian people, proposes to follow up the naval reconnaissance of last month by some show of military activity, which will have the double convenience of pleasing Italian patriots and of doing little harm to the Turks.

Rhodes is the most easterly island in the Aegean. It is an island long by 17 broad, and has a population of about 30,000 souls, of whom not one-sixth are Turks. The island has a good climate.

is mountainous, and the greatest elevation is mount Attayaro, 4,000 feet above sea-level. There is a fair amount of cultivation, mainly restricted to narrow belts along the coast. The landing appears to have taken place at Kalitheas Bay, in the north-eastern corner of the island. This bay is rather less than a mile deep, and the northern part of it is clear of danger at a quarter of a mile from the shore. At this period of the year the wind is north-westerly as a rule and continues to blow from this quarter with fair regularity during the summer. Kalitheas Bay would, therefore, at present offer a weather shore and has no doubt been selected for this reason.

A seizure of Turkish islands by Italy has been long expected, and the effect, so far as Turkey is concerned, has long since been discounted. A war of pin-pricks is not in the least likely to exercise any influence upon Turkish resolves, and if Italy desires to end the war this is not the way to do it. At the same time the appearance of Italian troops in the Aegean will have a certain political effect, and it can scarcely be said that the status quo in the Balkans, which Italy has undertaken to maintain, will in any way be strengthened.

After the naval reconnaissance Admiral Viale returned to Taranto and visited Rome, where he had several interviews with Ministers, including the Minister of War, and from this fact the inference was drawn that some military operation was in the wind. The names of two or three ships of the First Squadron occur in reports from Taranto, but the bulk of the ships of the First and Second Squadrons appear to be now in the Aegean, and at Stampalia we should expect to find the Duke of the Abruzzi's destroyers. Cruisers and auxiliary cruisers have been reported at various points off the Turkish mainland and the islands, while the watch on Rhodes has been close, and some 25 Turkish sailing craft have been captured near the island and sent to Stampalia. The School Division has returned to Naples and is said to be due at Spezia, but all reports of movements of ships must be taken for what they are worth. The censorship is efficient, and no news of important movements has of late been allowed to pass.

There has been a steady drain upon the troops in Africa for some few weeks past, and probably not less than 30,000 men of the 1888 class have returned to Italy for discharge to their homes. There are a few reports of fresh drafts from Italy for Africa, but on the whole it seems probable that the strength of the Italian forces has fallen to about 100,000 men, and the figure may be less if the troops in Rhodes have come from Africa. There is no word of any fresh call upon reservists and if the 1887 class is called up it will include a great many married men.

It is improbable that anything serious will be attempted in Africa until October, but the local garrisons upon the coast have been more active of late in operations of short range, and according to Italian accounts have scored some successes, notably at Khoms and near the Tunisian frontier. So far as can be judged at present, General Garioldi's landing has not intercepted the caravan trade from Tunisia and has merely deflected it slightly to the south. The attempts of Italy to bribe some of the tribes have not been successful, and from all parts of Central Africa reinforcements have joined the Turco-Arab ranks.

Neither money nor ammunition seems to be lacking. The Arabs are regularly paid, and supplies are fairly plentiful for the troops, but the refugees from the coast are suffering hardships. The enthusiasm for the war has lost nothing of its strength among the Arabs. The religious motive no doubt takes a prominent place and practically all native North Africa is solid against Italy, but there is also a labour question involved in this war, and it is accountable to a large extent for the stiffness of Arab resistance. The lower grade Italians compete, and often compete successfully, with native labour in Tunisia, and, as the Arab has a shrewd sense of business, he fears that an Italian Tripoli will mean the end of what may be called Arab trade unionism. It is also true that the Arabs fear Italian colonization, and as there are only a limited number of favoured cases, the Arabs think that the Italians will take these for themselves. Thus moral reasons for resistance combine with material.

Judging by the Italian Press, the summer campaign is to be as much diplomatic as military, and great hopes seem to be set upon the diplomatic traps to be set for Turkey. It is doubtful whether these will be effective. The Turks are patient people, and war is nothing to them, for it is their natural state. With 150,000 men in arms in Europe, and the power of trebling these numbers rapidly, Mahmud Shukret Pasha can afford to regard the general situation with equanimity, while, if the Italians are famous diplomatists, it can hardly be said that the Turks are much behind them in the art.

Turkey, of course, is receiving a very interesting lesson in the meaning of the command at sea, and finds that all her military friends and her formidable army cannot save her from considerable misadventure. This feeling is sinking very deeply into the Turks. We, again, are finding out that there is a concordance of interests between Muslims and ourselves, and our chief regret is that such an old and valued friend as Italy should be the Power to bring these lessons home to us. Like Lord Morley, we all nail our colours firmly to the fence and practise complete neutrality, but the end of this war, if it ever has an end, is not likely to leave the relations between the Powers in the Eastern Mediterranean completely undisturbed.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, May 5.

I am reliably informed that the Minister for Foreign Affairs has notified the Powers that Italy's operations in the Aegean must continue until Turkey unconditionally accepts the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, either spontaneously or as the result of the intervention of the Powers. It is added that the successive occupation of other Turkish islands in the Aegean entirely depends upon Turkey's attitude.

A pledge is given, however, that as soon as Turkey yields Italy will discontinue her operations and straightway surrender possession of the islands already seized, the occupation of which does not imply territorial conquest, but has been resorted to as the only available measure to compel Turkey's submission. Consequently the integrity of the Ottoman Empire is not to be regarded as threatened.

Rome, May 4.

The Giornale d'Italia says—"The object of occupying the island of Rhodes is, by obtaining possession of part of the enemy's territory, to damage his prestige, with the intention to restore that territory to the Turks as soon as they have withdrawn their troops from Lybia."

The Tribuna (official) says—"Our action strikes a blow at Turkey's ways of communication, and it is now our duty to push forward our plans for the isolation of Constantinople from the other parts of the Empire, and to see how much longer the gamblers at Sambrail will be able to shut their eyes to the new state of things by which they will shortly be ruined."

The Giornale d'Italia contains the following article on the present state of the hostilities between Turkey and Italy—

Already the mastery of the Aegean have been left to us by the Turks by the withdrawal of their naval forces from the Dardanelles. That mastery was still better demonstrated by the first raid of our fleet, which occupied the island of Stampalia, where a naval base was formed. Even the largest islands are without means of communication with the Porte owing to the cutting of the cables and the closing of the wireless stations. The object of occupying the island of Rhodes is, by obtaining possession of part of the enemy's territory, to damage his prestige, with the intention to restore that territory to the Turks as soon as they have withdrawn their troops from Lybia. The fact that General Ameglio is the leader of the expedition is a guarantee that operations will be vigorously conducted for the purpose of securing the incontestable establishment of Italian domination in the island and of crushing all resistance on the part of the Turkish garrison. Admiral Viale accompanied General Ameglio's division with the fleet in order to be prepared to support the landing of troops. The Italians thus afford proof positive of the possibility of landing troops rapidly and in large numbers on an open shore, an operation with regard to which there has been much discussion among experts. Italy shows that she knows how to disembark entire divisions in a few hours, as foreign military writers have already remarked. The occupation of Rhodes once again demonstrates that Italy has full liberty of action against Turkey. The Turkish people will in the end understand this if the Porte does not hide the results of our operations from them.—Reuter.

Constantinople, May 6.

The Turkish Press is unanimously of opinion that the Italian occupation of the islands will not affect the war, which they say must be fought out in Tripoli. The Tanin says that, even if Italy succeeds in conquering Tripoli, she cannot retain possession of the islands in the Archipelago.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Athens, May 5.

The announcement of the occupation of Rhodes excites the liveliest interest here. The hope is expressed that when the Italian troops are withdrawn at the end of the war this island and others, which are apparently to be occupied in the near future, will obtain autonomous institutions through the intervention of Europe. The principle on which the Powers have hitherto acted, except in the case of Macedonia—that no Christian community once liberated from the Ottoman yoke should be handed back to Turkey—is invoked, and it is pointed out that the islanders, who will doubtless fraternize with their liberators, will be exposed to reprisals on the part of the Turks should no measure be taken for their protection. It is even anticipated that they may offer resistance in the case of a Turkish re-occupation.

I have reason to believe, however, that there is little prospect that these hopes will be realized. In the best informed quarters the opinion prevails that Italy is proceeding to the occupation of the islands exclusively for her own purposes and is not disposed to contemplate any alteration of their future status in accordance with the aspirations of the inhabitants.

Vienna, May 6.

A note of semi-official character denies this evening the rumour that Italy intends to blockade the Aegean ports of Turkey and that the Powers have already received an intimation to this effect. This denial is evoked by an excited article in the Neue Presse, warning Italy against such interference with European trade and declaring that "the blockade of Salonika might entail consequences most unpleasant for Italy herself, seeing that a part of her army is now tied up" in Tripoli.

This threat is not echoed in any responsible quarter. The semi-official note above mentioned puts forward, on the contrary, the suggestion that the main object of Italy at present is to cut off European and Asiatic Turkey from all communication with Tripoli and entirely to suppress contraband. The outburst in the Neue Presse is believed to reflect the growing irritation of those financial and industrial circles that are feeling the pinch of the war.

Vienna, May 7

Another Viennese "Liberal" journal indulges to-day in a violent attack upon Italy and demands that Austria-Hungary, as a State highly interested in the trade of the Levant and in the Balkans, should put a stop to Italy's "frivolous game." "Austria-Hungary," it writes, "must not leave precedence to England, and, above all, ought no longer to have any regard for such an 'ally' as Italy." Unless Italy changes her policy she can no longer be tolerated in the Triple Alliance.

A note has been issued this evening from a semi-official quarter stating that the reports of the occupation of other Aegean islands by Italy are not confirmed, and that the Powers are unlikely to intervene unless neutral interests in the Aegean are more seriously affected than at present.

With regard to the assertion of an English provincial journal that an exchange of correspondence between Austria-Hungary and England has led to an agreement on Balkan policy between the two Governments the Neues Wiener Tagblatt will to-morrow publish a semi-official communication to the effect that though there has been no special correspondence, nor the conclusion of any positive agreement between the Dual Monarchy and England, their views on Balkan questions are so concordant that the action of the two Governments is likely to proceed on parallel lines.

(THE "DAILY NEWS.")

The Italians have occupied the town of Rhodes in the island of that name. As the cable connecting Rhodes with Constantinople has been cut we learn what we are allowed to know about the operations only from Italian sources. The Italian reports are obscure, and in some details conflicting, but one can pick out the main facts. The Italian fleet conveying Italian troops anchored off Rhodes on Friday night and began landing troops at dawn. There is a Turkish garrison on the island of some 2,000 men well armed and well supplied with ammunition. The Governor judged that it would be impossible to hold the town under the guns of the Italian fleet, and only a trifling resistance was offered to the advance of the Italians. The city was occupied yesterday and the garrison has withdrawn into the hills. It will be seen that what has happened so far has no military significance. The Turkish forces remain at large among the hills; the Italian forces, covered by the fleet, hold the town. In short, we have a repetition of the Tripoli situation, and it remains to be seen that Rhodes will prove an easy nut to crack.

The Italian Press, quite naturally but quite unconvincingly, proclaims the landing at Rhodes something like a decisive stroke. It will not affect the Turkish Government, who for practical purposes have been cut off from the island since the Italians established their command of the sea; nor will it damage the prestige of Turkey. It may, indeed, work the other way, for Turkish public opinion will see in this activity among the islands and this neglect of the mainland evidence of Italy's weakness and indecision. Nor will the threat to retain the island until Turkey evacuates Tripoli have much terror: Turkey knows quite well that Italy will not be allowed to hold Rhodes permanently. Of course, the landing in Rhodes may help to soothe for a time the discontent in Italy, and that is a matter of importance to the Cabinet. It also, and this is of general importance, makes a European Conference on Turkey at the close of this war more likely. There are several Powers with axes to grind who would like a conference, though the world is hardly likely to be the better for it.

The Closing of the Dardanelles.

Discussion in the Lords.

LORD NEWTON had the following question upon the paper:—

"To ask His Majesty's Government whether they have addressed any representation to the Italian Government with reference to the closing of the Dardanelles."

He said that since he put the question on the paper, an arrangement had been arrived at by which the Dardanelles were partially re-opened, but it was obviously merely temporary because of its liability to be upset by any additional action on the part of the Italian Fleet, and at any rate the Government might be glad to take the opportunity of making a statement on the subject. The military operations in Tripoli had proved to be considerably more difficult than had been anticipated, and so far as one could gather a sort of condition of stale-mate existed at present. In consequence of this state of things the Italian Government had carried the war into different parts of the Turkish Empire in opposition to what he believed was their original intention, and as the climax to this policy had attacked the Dardanelles. We had given most unmistakable evidence of our friendliness to the Italians during the present war, and, in view of what we had done in this respect, and putting aside all questions of morality, he thought we were entitled to ask that the war should not be conducted in a way which had become almost intolerable, as far as we were concerned, but that it should be localized as much as possible in accordance with the original intention. This could best be secured by asking the Italian Government to make a plain declaration of its policy and whether it would agree totally to exclude the Dardanelles from the area of the war.

Lord Nunburnholme, in asking why His Majesty's Government did not take steps to ensure the free passage of British ships through the Dardanelles, referred to the very serious loss which was being caused to the trade and commerce of the whole of Europe apparently because the Italians had come to a deadlock in their war with Turkey. He received advices from Constantinople yesterday to the effect that there were 185 vessels which were unable to pass either in or out of the Dardanelles, and that half of these were British ships. We were still a great Naval nation, and he thought we ought to make some show of protecting ourselves in this matter and give proof that there was some use of being a predominant Naval Power, if there was no other way of bringing about a solution of the difficulty.

VISCOUNT MORLEY'S STATEMENT

VISCOUNT MORLEY.—I am sure my noble friend will not suppose for a moment that His Majesty's Government have been indifferent to the disastrous state of things—it deserves no less serious a word than that—which has been existing for several days in the Black Sea and the Dardanelles. The figure of 185, which my noble friend said was the information he got yesterday, does not quite correspond with our own. It is rather higher than we should put it, but it is not worth while arguing for a moment as to whether it is 185 or 135. The root fact remains that we are suffering huge damage. In the matter of the grain trade, and perhaps the oil trade, Russia suffers more than we do. South Russia being greatly dependent on our market, but we are suffering peculiarly in shipping. In shipping our predominance is extraordinary, shipping ordinarily passing through the Dardanelles is largely British. The total tonnage of shipping arriving at Constantinople in 1909, the date of the latest Consular report, amounted to 15½ million tons. Of this 6¼ millions were British, 2¼ millions were Greek, 1¼ millions were Austrian, and 1 million was German. We have no information at the Board of Trade as to the shipping now, but the foregoing figures of the ordinary traffic show satisfactorily our supremacy in commerce in the Black Sea and how the relative effects of this disastrous closing of the Straits were distributed.

I think my noble friend will feel that it is not worth while to go further into the details of the transactions between ourselves and the Governments of Turkey and Italy, but let me assure him that, since the Straits were closed, we have been in constant communication with both those Governments, and he has seen to-day in the public prints that, after no unreasonable length of time, considering the difficulties of the Porte in coming to a decision, after we have taken prompt and friendly steps to call their attention to the mischief which is being done to the great interests of ourselves, and, after taking reasonable time for consideration, we heard from our Ambassador, last night, I think, the intelligence which has already, in a less formal shape, been given through the public Press. Yesterday the Porte informed the Ambassador that it had been decided upon to open the Dardanelles under the same conditions as existed before its closing, namely, that vessels must pass with pilots. The opening will take place as soon as ever the mines can be removed, but the Ottoman Government—it may be of interest to the noble lord opposite—maintains its absolute right to close the Dardanelles completely in case, and as soon as, the necessity should arise.

The noble lord opposite was, I think, rather unreasonable in asking the Government here to make a general statement surveying all our relations with the Porte and with Italian Government of Rome and other Powers. I think unreasonable because—and no one in this House will understand it better than the noble lord himself—it cannot be expected that, when you are in the middle of a war in which you are maintaining an absolute and firm neutrality, the Government should be called upon to produce all the details of all the negotiations, all the changes of view. I am sure he will find in his confidence that that is not a fair thing to expect. Nor can the noble lord expect me now to get up and follow him in the criticism he made of something that Austria-Hungary is supposed to have done, what the relations are between Austria-Hungary and Russia and Italy, what promise or undertaking has been given by Italy to Austria, and so on. Then the noble lord, having assumed that there has been an undertaking by Austria-Hungary to Italy and vice versa, asks why we do not approach Italy to exact from her the same kind of undertaking in our own regard that he assumes she has given to Austria-Hungary. That is not at all a reasonable position to take up. Then he says plainly that we ought to protest to Italy that we cannot endure, being, as my noble friend said, the supreme Naval Power, these roving operations of war. I wonder that he with his diplomatic experience thinks it possible for a Government that is firmly neutral to say to either of the two belligerent Powers, "You shall not carry on the war in the way you are doing."

Lord Newton.—I am sorry to interrupt the noble viscount, but that is precisely what the Austrian Government has done.

Viscount Morley.—It is what the noble lord says Austria has done, but I submit that nothing could be more inexpedient than that we should in this House assume that the Austrian Government has done that or that, and on the basis of that assumption we are to be catechized and interrogated as to whether we will not undertake the same step. You cannot. I am amazed the noble lord does not agree with it. He must agree.

Could we in reason be asked to say either to Turkey or Italy, "We will prescribe to you the limits within which you shall carry on your military operations?" If they came into the Thames then we should have something to say. But to say that Turkey is not to defend herself and that Italy is not to follow her own plans of military operations is to go beyond anything that in international law or diplomatic usage has ever been conceived. There are those, I know—I am not sure there is not a member of this House—who, by way of speculation to avoid the evils of war, wish that the Powers of the world at The Hague or elsewhere should agree to the acceptance of some sort of a principle to the effect that the area of a war should be strictly localized and limited. That may or may not prove ultimately a step towards the civilization of war and the conveniences of war, but it is no use for us to-day who have practical business on our hands and who have the difficulties and the inconveniences of the hour to settle, to assume any realization of a speculation of that kind. When the correspondence and telegrams are, in the fulness of time, published in a Blue book I will undertake to say that the House and the country will find that we have thoroughly and assiduously followed the full duties of a firmly neutral Power between these two belligerents. The noble lord said nothing about the Turkish case. We have done full justice to the Turkish case. The Turkish Government have a right to take all legitimate means for the defence of their own territory.

No treaty can oblige Turkey when her actual and immediate safety is concerned to open the passage giving free access to the destruction, if necessary, of her own capital. You could not expect that. Another point. This is rather against those who are impatient—some, like the noble lord, at our being so patient with Italy, and others at our being so patient with Turkey. We hold a completely equal balance. With regard to the Turkish case, when their military authorities tell them that to abandon the defence of the mines would be an equivalent to a reduction of their power of defence by about 50 per cent., such a consideration a neutral Government like ourselves is bound to take into account. I will say this. Neither the noble lord nor anybody in the House will deny the obligation by which Turkey is bound to open the Straits under the Treaty of Paris, 1856, the Treaty of London, 1871, the abortive Treaty of San Stefano, and the Treaty of 1878. She is bound to keep the Straits open for neutral commerce unless, some immediate and direct necessity for her own safety should arise. We have held that in full regard. But now I think we might say that, while the principle that the Straits are to be kept open to commerce unless danger is actual or imminent imposes an obligation on Turkey from the point of view of international morality, it carries with it the corresponding expediency—I will not put it higher than that—that that principle should not be strained and overstrained in case of war by other parties to it. The noble lord indulged himself in a rather cynical interpretation of the attack on the Dardanelles. I have seen it in the public prints, and it comes to this, that neither the Italian nor the Turkish Government were wrong in inflicting severe inconvenience on neutrals on the chance of inducing the effective intervention of those neutrals in bringing to an end what is certainly apparently an extraordinarily obscure and ambiguous military issue.

As to Italy, I confess I was rather sorry to hear at this stage of things the tone of the noble lord. I have said it before and say it again, we cannot insist on either of these belligerents foregoing their full belligerent rights or limiting them for the convenience of neutral States. When I add the consideration and I venture to think it is well worthy of the attention of your noble House, that it would be a very great mistake if, in our natural impatience with such transactions as have recently taken place in the Dardanelles we were to leave out of sight the wider elements that affect both the Turkish and Italian cases and our attitude with regard to these cases. It would be a great mistake if we left out of sight with regard to Turkey the enormous Mahammadan interests with which we are concerned. With regard to Italy, on the other hand, it would certainly be an immense, and I will even say a lamentable, mistake, if we were to forget our friendship, our long traditional friendship, with Italy in the past, and, more than that, if we were to forget our concern in her position and relations as a Mediterranean Power in a very easily imaginable future. I do not think I need say more—I have disappointed, I am sure, the noble lord—I could not make, and I do not think he could expect it, a general statement of all that has been going on in this matter. We, at all events, have got for the time a situation which is better than a few days ago we could have hoped.

The Earl of Cromer said that it would have been a departure to have shown any special friendliness either to Italy or Turkey. The neutrality of Egypt was not due so much to friendliness to Italy as to a regard for the interests of Egypt itself and all the people residing there. It would have been disastrous if we had been dragged into this quarrel with which we had no concern, and his Majesty's Government had done extremely well in keeping out of it. If the idea got abroad in Egypt that we were not acting in Egyptian but Italian interests it might do some harm.

The Marquess of Lansdowne.—We have all listened with interest to the statement of the noble viscount, and for myself I am prepared to say that I have heard that statement on the whole with considerable satisfaction. The noble viscount may perhaps have fallen short of the expectations of my noble friend. My noble friend certainly favours the strenuous methods of diplomacy, which I cannot help thinking might not be found quite so easy of application as he supposes. At any rate the noble viscount must have convinced all those who listened to him that he and his colleagues fully realize the great gravity of the situation which has arisen in the Eastern Mediterranean. I will not repeat what he has said as to the magnitude of our interests in the commerce of the Black Sea, or as to the grave menace to those interests which we discern in the recent dislocation of that trade. It is satisfactory to know that the Government have spared no efforts to bring about a mitigation of those circumstances, and that they have been able to achieve at any rate a certain amount of success. The noble viscount said a word as to the Treaty obligations of Turkey, and there I entirely agree with him. I think he might have gone back even to the Treaty of Adrianople to show the obligation of Turkey to keep the Dardanelles open for the passage of peaceable traders. The noble viscount is no doubt correct when he tells us that that obligation must be interpreted subject to the inherent rights of Turkey to take whatever measures are reasonable, necessary or justifiable to ensure her own safety. The Turkish Government no doubt in this case claims that the temporary sealing of the Straits was a measure indispensable to secure the Turkish capital, and I think she may fairly add the argument that this unfortunate conflict was not one of her seeking and that it was not due to any action of hers that the area of conflict was extended in a manner which most of us greatly deplore. But whatever the strict rights of the Turkish Government may be, we all of us feel that they should not be strained, and that the utmost regard should be paid to the interests and claims of all concerned in the peaceable trade of the Mediterranean. I think it is creditable to the Turkish Government that they should have frankly recognized this, as I understand to be the case, and undertaken to open the Straits to the same extent as they were open before these lamentable events, subject to certain regulations as to pilotage which seem to be reasonable. The accounts given in the newspapers of the conditions under which Turkey has agreed to this concession suggest one or two points which are perhaps a little disconcerting. In the telegram published in the Times this morning it is stated that in the Turkish reply which was communicated to the Russian Government the day before yesterday Turkey announces that the Government is anxious to reopen the Straits as soon as that is possible "without danger." I take it that points to danger from mines. In the same telegram it is said that Turkey will reopen the Straits as soon as Italy gives pledges not to repeat her attack on the Dardanelles. I should be glad if the noble viscount is able to tell us whether there is any truth in that statement, because obviously that would be a very serious limitation to the Turkish announcement and one which might make it much less satisfactory than we now believe it to be.

Viscount Morley of Blackburn.—That assertion is quite inconsistent with the words used to our Ambassador yesterday or the day before.

The Marquess of Lansdowne.—I am very glad to have elicited that statement. It will give great relief to many who have read this telegram and were a little alarmed by it. This is perhaps hardly the occasion for dwelling upon the larger aspects of the case, but they are very important. We think, of course, of ourselves, and of the £20,000 which we are said to be losing every day during the time these straits are sealed. But the real question which will no doubt have to be considered sooner or later is the extent to which a belligerent Power, controlling narrow waters which form a great trade avenue for the commerce of the world, is justified in entirely closing such an avenue in order to facilitate the hostile operations in which that Power finds itself involved. That is a very serious matter. There is a certain analogy between that case and the case of some of those unfortunate trade disputes which we have been lately discussing. It seems to me that just as public opinion in any country would be slow to tolerate arrangements under which a local trade dispute might have the effect of paralysing the whole industrial life of the country, so public opinion amongst the great nations would be slow to tolerate a state of things under which a local conflict involving only two Powers would be allowed to create such serious detriment and disturbance to the whole trading community of the world. I am glad to know from the noble viscount that our diplomacy is being directed to obtain the recognition of that principle, and I entirely agree that whatever our policy may be in this matter it is a policy which we should pursue tactfully and without impatience, bearing in mind on the one hand the relations in which we stand to the Turkish Empire owing to the great number of his Majesty's Mahomedan subjects, and upon the other hand our old friendship with Italy, which should certainly, so far as possible, be taken into account in any diplomatic communications with her at a crisis which affects her so closely as this does.

Mr. Sykes (Central Hull, Opp.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Italian Government had caused to be landed arms and ammunition on the Arabian coast of the Red Sea; and whether his Majesty's Government proposed to take steps to prevent the wholesale distribution of arms among the tribesmen of Southern Arabia.

Sir E. Grey (Northumberland, Berwick).—I do not know that the Italian Government have taken any such action as that to which the hon. member refers, and so far as I am aware there has been no "wholesale distribution" of arms in Southern Arabia.

Mr. Sykes.—Has there been no distribution of arms at all?

Sir E. Grey.—I have not got information to that effect. No information has reached me showing that there is any necessity for us to take steps or any ground on which we could take them.

Mr. King (Somerset, N., Min.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could state if recent negotiations for bringing to an end the war between Turkey and Italy had had any result.

Sir E. Grey.—The general character of the replies received from both the Italian and Turkish Governments have now appeared in the Press. I am not in a position to say what further steps the Powers may be able to take in the matter.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, May 3.

Lord Morley's reply to the speeches of Lords Newton and Nunburnholme has aroused lively interest here and receives very characteristic treatment from a part of the Press. The Tarxophil Zeit announces it in the words that "the representative of the Government, Viscount Morley, declared that in circumstances easily conceivable England reckons on Italy in the Mediterranean," and argues editorially that in the eventuality of a European war England counts upon Italian faithlessness towards the Triple Alliance. The Zeit considers it remarkable that a "governing English statesman deems the time to have come to explode the legend of the Triple Alliance as far as Italy is concerned."

The Neue Freie Presse places a similar construction upon Lord Morley's reported words, which, it says, "can only be taken to mean that he pointed to the possibility of a change of front in Italian policy." England, it adds, can only have an interest in the position and relationships of Italy as a Mediterranean Power if Italy stands on the side of the Triple Entente, not on that of the Triple Alliance.

Until the full text of the proceedings of the House of Lords is available it would be premature to venture comment upon Lord Newton's alleged view of Austro-Hungarian action in regard to Italy. The facts of the case may, however, be recorded without prejudice. Italy and Austria-Hungary are bound towards each other in regard to Albania, and, consequently, in regard to the Ionian and Adriatic coast of Turkey, by an agreement discussed between the Marquis Visconti Venosta and Count Goluchowski at Monza in 1897, and formally concluded by an exchange of Notes between them in 1899 to the effect that neither Power would seek territorial acquisitions in Albania and that, in case the Ottoman Empire should break up or be partitioned, the two Powers would work together to promote Albanian autonomy. This agreement has been repeatedly confirmed by subsequent Italian and Austro-Hungarian Foreign Ministers. After the declaration of war against Turkey, Italy proceeded to put out of action the Turkish torpedo-boats stationed at various points of the Albanian coast, and, in so doing, excited the Albanians and perturbed Austro-Hungarian public opinion. On the basis of the agreement concerning Albania and of the Italian circular Note to the Balkan States at the beginning of the war, Count Aehrenthal called the attention of Italy to these effects of the operations, which were, however, continued until their object had been attained. The militant section of the Austrian Press demanded the despatch of an Austrian squadron to the Albanian coast, but Count Aehrenthal, who was strong enough to resist shortsighted clamour, ignored the demand, as he knew that the repercussion of the Italian operations in Albania was accidental and temporary, not intentional and permanent.

Turkey's firm Resolve.

The Views of the Grand Vizier.

Constantinople, May 17.

The Grand Vizier, Said Pasha, made the following statement yesterday with reference to the war with Italy:—

"Italian action in the Aegean Sea and everywhere else cannot possibly modify the attitude of Turkey, who is resolved to resist to the end.

"If the attack on the Dardanelles were repeated we should decide again to close the Straits, which is our incontestable right. This right is even recognised by Russia.

"We will take every possible care to protect the commercial interests of the neutral Powers; we will protect them as we would our own, but we will never give way before the aggression of Italy."

In reply to a question how he thought it would be possible to arrange peace, the Grand Vizier replied:—"It is probable that peace will come only by mediation or by conference. My personal opinion is that it will be by mediation, because a conference would be unfavourable to Italian interests. But one thing is certain—Turkey will not abdicate a single right which she possesses!"

The Views of the War Minister.

I

("EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Monday, May 6.

MAHMUD SHEVKET PASHA, the Turkish War Minister, received me to-day and made the following explicit declaration on the war with Italy:—

Italy's action in the Aegean Sea, including the occupation of Rhodes, is merely child's play which cannot have any influence whatever on the conclusion of peace.

The Turkish Government and nation are equally resolved to resist to the end. We shall never give way; we shall fight to a finish.

This war will spell the ruin of Italy, as Turkey will suffer neither the moral nor the material losses which will fall on Italy.

Speaking of the delay in re-opening the Dardanelles to international commerce, the War Minister informed me that it is due solely to the strong wind which has been blowing from the south. The removal of the mines is delicate and dangerous, and has to be undertaken with every precaution.

The work of clearing the straits began yesterday, and it is expected will be concluded on Saturday or Monday next.

It has been alleged that Mahmud Shevket, who is the favourite pupil of Field-Marshal von der Goltz, is a blind partisan of Germany. He rebutted this charge in Parliament during a sensational scene on 8th November of last year. "I am not at all a partisan of Germany," he declared; "on the contrary, I consider the salvation of the country rests on friendship with England."

The greatest excitement was caused by this candid but incautious outburst, and the Grand Vizier and the Minister of Foreign Affairs hurried to the tribune, begging the speaker not to touch on so delicate a question.

II

Telegraphing on the 7th May, the Constantinople correspondent of the Daily Telegraph gave the following account of an interview which he had had with the Turkish Minister of War, General Mahmud Shevket Pasha. The Minister, he said, was good enough to receive me and to make to me the following observations:—

"Yes, the Italians have landed not at Lakina (Lachina) as is stated by all the papers, but, according to the latest despatches which has reached me, at Phylax. The disembarkation was effected under cover of the guns of the warships, which carried out a prolonged bombardment. The Italians landed both infantry and artillery. Naturally we resisted and there was a hot engagement. Down to the present the town of Rhodes has not been taken. There were some losses on both sides, and we captured a non-commissioned officer. We attribute the meagre results of the Italian action, despite the enormous efforts put forth by their artillery, to the obvious inferiority of their gunners, who are very inefficient and short-sighted."

I then asked the Minister if he anticipated further attacks on other islands in the Archipelago, to which he replied that it was very probable. To my question as to what effect the Italian move would have upon the situation in Tripoli he answered:—

"None, for it has no relation to that situation. The Italians are profiting by the extreme weakness of our navy to attack the Archipelago, of which the only effective defence is a naval defence. We shall, of course, do our best to defend ourselves everywhere, but even if eventually the great isles should be occupied we shall not yield a single iota on the Tripolitan question."

Mahmud Shevket Pasha went on to say that it was a matter of patience, and, he added, smiling: "It does not appear to me credible that the Italians, after declaring the annexation of Tripoli, will also declare the annexation of the Archipelago."

When I asked the famous Minister of War if the Government was not perturbed by this new phase of the conflict he replied: "I can affirm to you that neither myself nor my colleagues are in the least disturbed. As for the army, the sole result of the Italian action is to render it more exasperated than ever."

Letters to the Press.

Moslem Unity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—Few people, even the best-informed in Europe realise the deep and sincere sympathy that attaches Moslems together all over the world. Islam has been in practice the only moral force that has united in practical, social, and daily life men of different colours and states of civilisation, from the best Persian and Turkish and Arab and Indian to the negro. This power has an obverse side, and that obverse side is that whatever affects Moslem sentiment in one part of the world is immediately felt in another. Lately I realised this more than ever. The undoing of the partition and the change of capital was hardly ever referred to in private conversation by Indian Moslems except those who were directly interested in the matter, while a wail of mourning and sorrow was the only sentiment of men, women, and children of all ranks in India over Tripoli and Persia and Morocco. These were my own personal and direct experiences.

Hotel Ritz, Place Vendôme, Paris.

AGA KHAN

British Interests in the East.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—Travellers and students of foreign politics and business men have in this country long been looking for some sign of awakening on the part of the nation to the magnitude of their task in the East, its heavy responsibilities, and the great perils with which in latter days it has been beset. They looked in vain, while newcomers in Europe and on the extremities of Asia seemed to be taking up the task which had fallen from our feeble hands. Quite possibly the hands may only have appeared feeble; something which was not visible may have kept them tied. That would form an interesting subject for inquiry. But, whatever may have been the causes, the effect produced was one of abdication. The voice of England was heard in hissing accents or not at all.

Two national uprisings—one in Turkey, the other in Persia—occurred while we were still under the influence of this paralysis. In both these countries our own stake is demonstrably large, and if in previous periods our horse may have refused to run, it was hands he now required and no longer the spur. New impulses were coursing in his veins. If he was still the "wrong horse," he was certainly a different horse, and an encouraging feature was this, that he showed a marked preference to be guided by us rather than by others. Both in Turkey and in Persia the men of the new movements turned towards England for inspiration, for counsel, for assistance.

It would be invidious, and it may be still premature, to attempt to apportion the blame for the subsequent failure between those men and ourselves. What is certain is that the occasion came—the occasion for more hopeful relations; that it arose, that it did not materialise, and that it is fast slipping away. There is an old Persian proverb that three things never return: the spent arrow, the spoken word, and the lost opportunity. Let us hope that the situation is still not past retrieving, and that between them and as a new era is still to dawn.

It is under the influence of such thoughts that one turns with feelings of satisfaction and of expectancy to the celebration by The Near East of its anniversary. Few young newspapers have stepped so quickly into public recognition, regard, and appreciation. That alone is a hopeful sign. It has focussed and brought to bear upon the questions of the day the knowledge, the experience, and the informed opinions which were either lying idle in the breasts of scattered Englishmen well acquainted with these questions, or were being dissipated in the columns of the Press as a whole. It has shown us what a wealth of such material we possess, commensurate with the extent and variety of our interests in the countries west of India. If, in addition to these achievements, it may in the future supply the need of a newspaper, representative of British opinion, circulating in Turkey and even in Persia, among the educated classes, it will have established a further claim upon our gratitude.

British policy and British motives are so continually misrepresented in local newspapers inspired by foreigners that the need is real, and it is urgent for an authoritative exposition, circulating locally, of the true character of this policy or motives from time to time.

Quite recently there has arisen in this country a remarkable revival of interest in Eastern questions. Persia has been mainly responsible for this revival, and it is surprising how quickly has spread knowledge of the Persian problem in certain quarters of the Press. The core of the problem in Persia is much the same as in the case of Turkey. Centuries of despotism have left the people without natural leaders of capacity or experience. The despots once removed, a disintegrating process ensues, and certain foreign interests are well served by this process. It is in the interests of the British Empire, on the other hand, to see this process arrested. It is not an easy task, but neither is it an impossible one. Without undue interference in the internal affairs of these countries it should be feasible for our representatives to keep in close touch with the new men, to endeavour to lead their impulses into practicable channels, and to save them from foreign humiliations. Out of such relations would spring confidence in themselves and in us. Nor could we, responsible as we are to so many millions of Muhammadans, be denied the right of offering counsel and assistance of this nature. The right becomes a duty from our own point of view when we consider the momentous nature of the changes that are taking place. May it not be by our fault that the course of these changes be turned away and lose the name of action?—Yours respectfully,

H. F. B. LYNCH.

The War and Egypt.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—During a recent visit to Egypt I was concerned to learn from authoritative sources that the failure of the Italians to make successful war in Tripoli was having a very far-reaching effect in Egypt and the Egyptian Sudan. The fact that the Arabs of the desert are able to drive a disciplined army of Europeans back to the shelter of their naval batteries is discussed by dragomans, donkey boys, hushandmen, soldiers, and clerics from the steps of Shepherd's Hotel to the upper reaches of the Nile. It should be remembered that for the most part the Arabs who discuss these details do not readily distinguish between the nationalities of Europe. To them the Crescent is rising superior to the Cross. As far as British prestige in Egypt and the Sudan is concerned, this is not a small matter. As it is, our military position in Egypt is grotesquely inadequate to meet any substantial emergency, if we estimate that emergency on the basis of the total number of rifles that are available in native hands. It is now understood that Italy proposes no further move into the Tripolitaine until October next. From the Italian point of view this is doubtless wise, but for those nations which, like ourselves, are influenced by this unfortunate hysteria that has seized upon Italy the prolongation of what in Egypt is believed to be Moslem success is a matter of real and earnest moment. It would be well if people in this country realised this, and that the evil effects of the Italians' inability to carry out a colonial war would have been more drastically brought home to the British public if it had not been our good fortune to have Lord Kitchener at the British Agency. At this juncture in Egyptian history the effect of Lord Kitchener's presence has been equal to that of a division of British infantry.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

London, May 8

LIONEL JAMES.

Italian "Victories."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—The papers of 4th May contained triumphant accounts (emanating from Rome) of the capture of Lebda, the birthplace of Septimius Severus, in which 300 of the enemy were said to have been killed and the captured city at once fortified.

This reads no doubt extremely well, but how many readers really know what it means. The little town of Khoms, of perhaps 600 inhabitants, lies seventy miles east of Tripoli Town. It was occupied quite early in the war by the Italians. The site of Lebda is two miles east on the sea, and consists of various ancient ruins, columns, and fragments protruding from a waste of drifting sand. The ground is, in fact, so full of ruined masonry that it cannot be cultivated, and even Arabs will not live there. The desert has, in fact, reclaimed it. It is this choice bit of Tripoli that Italy with its troops two miles away, its gunboats, and its airships has at last conquered. Mergub, on the other hand, which was occupied a couple of months ago, is a strong point 500 feet above sea level, and three and a-half miles west of Khoms.

Sepping Wright's despatch (about same date), describing the Italian warship attack, shows also that the Italians are still kept out of Zenzur oasis, twelve miles west of Tripoli Town, on the coast. This has, I believe, been reported as captured several times. Mergub and Ain Zara, respectively, three and a-half and six miles from the coast, are, as far as I know, the furthest points inland to which the Italians have so far penetrated.—Yours obediently, Staplehurst, May 5.

H. S. COWPER.

طلسم ہو رہا

You know it by this.

طلسم موش رہا ایک مشہور کتاب
ہے جس میں عجیب و غریب انصا
مذکور میں — ایک زمانہ میں اس
کتاب کا بہت چرچا تھا — ناظرین ان
انسانوں کو بڑھ کر معوجہ رہ جائے
تیم اور بے ساختہ اس کے مصنف کو
دان دیتے تھے کہ وہ کیا باتیں دماغ سے
نکالی ہیں! مگر وہ تو فقط انصا
ہی تھے اب اصلی چیز ملاحظہ کیجئے —
زوروفون رکارڈ پر صنف بجائے ۲۵
گالوں کے ۶ چھ گالے چھاپے ہیں اور
چھپوں گالے حسب معمول صرف
۴۰ روپے میں لکڑی ہیں۔

ایک زوروفون رکارڈ پر مشہور
گوہیوں کے مقبول گالے اور ۶ چھ
گالے اور قیمت صرف ۴۰ روپے۔
صارف لکڑیاں بیچنے کے ساتھ
ان طلسمی رکارڈوں کے منتظر تھے
اور صارف ایجنٹ لکڑی پر لکھا
کر رہے تھے۔ اب آپ کی غیبت
طبع کے واسطے یہ حاضر ہیں۔ ان
گالوں کی بھد مالک ہے اسلئے فوراً
خرید فرمائے۔

اس صنف کے اردو رکارڈوں کی
نہرست ضمیمہ لڑہ ترین گالوں سے
لبالب ہے۔ کون نہیں جانتا کہ محمدی
جان - محمد حسین - جالکی ہائی -
اچے اچے الفاظ میں مقبول خاص
رعام ہیں۔ مگر قاری عبدالباقی
صاحب ایک مقدس بزرگ ہیں جنہوں
لے بڑے ذوق و عوق کی کیفیت میں
حضرت غوث الاعظم عبد القادر گیلانی
علیہ الرحمہ کی شان میں ۲۵ غزلیں
لاٹیں ہیں۔ ان کے سنہ سے لب
پر ہوا اثر ہوتا ہے۔ ہٹارس کی
گندھاروں کے گالے کو ایسے پسند
ہوئے ہیں کہ ان کی تعریف لکھنے
کی ضرورت ہی نہیں۔ طلسمی
رکارڈ کو ضرور سننے والے آپ کو
حسرت میں رہیں گی۔

الم

دی گریمر فون کمپنی لمیٹڈ
پوسٹ بکس نمبر ۴۸ کلکتہ

BENGAL VETERINARY COLLEGE.

"The last date of admission of students into the Bengal Veterinary College for the current year is 10th June 1912. Candidates should be present at the College with necessary certificates at 11 A.M. on the above-mentioned date for selection."

1-6 12.

"PRINCIPAL."

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh, B.A., LL.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,

"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta

The All-India Tea & Trading Co., Limited.

Head Office:—SYLHET.

Capital:—Rs. 10,00,000 (Ten Lakhs)
Divided into 40,000 shares of Rs. 25, payable in five annual instalments

A large area 5,300 acres, suitable for tea has already been secured, and the work of reclamation commenced from November 1911.

Board of Directors:—Hon'ble D. C. Deb Bahadur, Senior Government Pleader; Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid, B.L., Zemindar and Tea proprietor; Babus N. K. Roy, Dastidar, Zemindar; S. M. Chaudhury, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; B. N. Sarma, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert; M. C. Datta, pleader; N. N. Datta, B.L., pleader; P. C. Datta, B.L., pleader; D. N. Datta, Manager, Kalingar Tea Estate; H. C. Singha, pleader; J. Trishul, Merchant and Tea proprietor; Dr. B. K. Nandy, L.M.S., and proprietor, Baikunathpur Agricultural Farm.

Managing Director:—Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid.

Secretary:—Babu H. C. Sinha.

Organisers:—Babus S. C. Sinha, late Editor, Weekly Chronicle; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Expert.

Bankers:—The Sylhet Loan Co., Ltd.

Already a considerable number of shares has been taken up.

Reliable and respectable Agents for sale of shares are wanted in all parts of India and Burma.

For Forms and Prospectuses, etc., apply to—

H. C. SINHA,

8-6-12.

Secretary.

The Regular Homoeopathic College,

118-A, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta.

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopath, Dr. R. C. Nag, M.U., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica" at the Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years. (H) L. M., B. & (M) M.B. titles. Most regular lectures. The S. most experienced and efficient and include Dr. Younan and I. M. Mullick. Best lectures "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class. Dissections arranged. Evening Classes. A few Bedsteads for deserving Mohammedan students. Rooms fitted with electric lights and fan. Students open on the 3rd June. Apply to SUPERINTENDENT at 43, Chowdhury Street, Calcutta.

WANTED

CANVASSERS

Apply for terms to:—MANAGER,

"The Comrade,"

109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN TYPOGRAPHICAL DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

In Aid of The Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

No. 9-12524.

No. 9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of The Gramophone Company, Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, N.Y., U.S.A. — "Its articles are well thought out and clear expositions of truth."

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Hastings, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopedia Britannica — "Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstoy — "The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Religions — "Westerners interested in the study of the Mohammedan religion should subscribe to the Review of Religions."

Annual — Rs. 4-6 of Rs. 6.

For further particulars apply to the Editor, The Review of Religions, 11, Bedford Square, London, W.C.1.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says:—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....as a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

Apply to the Manager, THE "COMRADE,"
109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Corporation of Calcutta.

NOTICE.

Applications are invited and will be received up to the 21st July 1912, by the Health Officer to the Corporation from Mahomedan Hospital Assistants for the two posts of Sub-Registrars of deaths at Bagman and Tiljulla Burial Grounds.

The salary will be Rs. 50 per month in the grade of Rs. 50-65.

The selected candidates will be required to subscribe and conform to the rules of the Provident Fund, etc.

Applicants must hold diploma from a Government Medical Institution and state their age, relationship with any one in the service of the Corporation and enclose copies of diploma and testimonials.

C. C. CHATTERJEE,
Secretary to the Corporation.

MUNICIPAL OFFICE,
Calcutta, the 20th May 1912.

1-6-12.

سمن بغرض تنقیص مقدمہ

(آدر ۵ - قواعد ۱ و ۵ مجموعہ ضابطہ دیوانی سنہ ۱۹۰۸ ع)

نمبر مقدمہ ۲

بعدالمت حاکم تحصیل رام سنی گھاٹ ضلع بارہ بنکی مقام صدر بارہ بنکی۔
مدعی سید اولاد حسین ولد سید سرفراز علی قوم سید ساکن موضع منگولہ پرگنہ اودولی۔
مدعا علیہ مرزا مرتضی بیگ ولد لودھی بیگ و مرزا تجمل بیگ و مرزا شجاعت بیگ و مرزا ذوالفقار بیگ
پران مرزا اصغر بیگ ساکن موضع چور پرگنہ اودولی۔
بنام مرزا شجاعت بیگ ولد مرزا اصغر بیگ ساکن موضع چور پرگنہ اودولی وارث غیر دلوں
گلی نمبر ۲۸ مکان نمبر ۲۸۔
واضح ہو کہ مدعی نے تمہارے نام ایک نالش بابت منافع کے دائر کی ہے لہذا تم کو حکم ہوتا ہے کہ
تم بتاریخ پندرہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ ع و نمٹ ۱۰ دی بجہ دن اسالٹا یا معرفت وکیل کے جو مقدمہ کے حاکم سے
قرار واقعی واقف کیا گیا ہو اور جو کل امور اہم متعلقہ مقدمہ کا جواب دے سکے یا جسکے ساتھ کوئی
اور شخص ہو کہ جواب ایسے سوالات کا دے سکے حاضر ہو اور جواب دہی دعویٰ کی کرو۔ اور ہر گاہ
جملہ دستاویزات جن پر تم بتائید اپنے جواب دہی کے استدلال کرنا چاہتے ہو اسی روز پیش کرو۔
اور تم کو اطلاع دی جاتی ہے کہ اگر بروز مذکور تم حاضر نہ ہوئے تو مقدمہ بہ غیرحاضری تمہارے
مسموع اور فیصل ہوگا۔

یہ ٹیپ میرے دستخط اور مہر عدالت کے آج بتاریخ ۱۳ ماہ می سنہ ۱۹۱۲ ع جاری کیا گیا۔

(دستخط)

DO YOU WANT TO EARN RS. 3 A DAY— ?

Making Hosiery on Durbar Auto-knitters, work easy and interesting and finished in spare time. No Experience necessary. Distance immaterial. Reliable persons kept well employed with regular work by Hosiery Manufacturers.

WE SHOW YOU HOW

to work the machine—to make the Hosiery. You then supply us with your work done at Home, for which we pay you specified wages.

CAN YOU FIND A BETTER PROPOSITION ?

What Others Say.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for Prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,

Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by / Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 23. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, June 8, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1.

CONTENTS

	PAGE.		PAGE
THE WEEK	509	TURKISH RELIEF FUND	519
TETE A TETE—		THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
“Hamdard” Debentures	511	News of the Week	520
Moslems in South Africa	511	News by the English Mail	520
Gujarat Moslems and their Diet	512	The Balkan Committee	522
“Urdu-Speaking Councils”	512	Bulgarian Ambitions in Mac-
Race or Religion	513	donia	522
LEADING ARTICLES—		Back from the War	522
“A Mockery of British Justice”	513	Turkey and the War	523
The Moslem University	516	Italian Reply	524
PERSIA—		Only Way to Peace	524
News of the Week	517	Misery in Italy	524
News by the English Mail	517	The Ilavoc of War	524
MOROCCO		London All India Moslem
News of the Week	518	League	525
News by the English Mail	518	The Turkish Woman	525
Marching to the Unknown	519	The Dardanelles	525
French Treatment of the Sultan	519	ADVERTISEMENTS ... 526—528

The Week.

Labour Unrest.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE closed the enquiry on the 25th May into the Dock dispute after hearing further evidence by the masters who complained that the men had been called out, though they had apparently no grievance. Sir Edward Clarke, in concluding his speech, urged the necessity for avoiding an extended strike. He emphasised that no succession of strikes would ever compel non-unionists or masters to obey the Unions. He was hopeful, however, that legislation would go far to solve industrial difficulties. He would do his best to make a fair report as early as possible. He complimented the conduct of both sides during the enquiry.

One hundred thousand transport workers held a demonstration in Trafalgar Square on the 26th May. A large contingent of police was on duty, but the strikers conducted themselves in a most orderly manner. A resolution was passed demanding an hour with overtime rate of one shilling and two pence per hour, and declaring that none would return to work until all grievances were satisfied.

Japanese dockers have telegraphed to the London strikers wishing them success.

Two hundred vessels are lying in the Thames unable to discharge cargoes of meat, fruit, vegetable and grain. Several jam and other factories have closed down for want of raw material. Prices of food are rising.

At a miners' demonstration at Durham, Mr Lowther, of the Labour College, declared that they were organising a far greater strike than the last one before the end of the year.

A large force of police has been detailed for duty at the London docks to protect the men unloading food cargoes. It is expected that the Smithfield butchers will endeavour to land consignments with their own employes. The butchers have applied for police protection for meat vans and the porters at the markets. No military movements have hitherto been announced, but it transpires that the Guards Brigade encamped at Pirbright has been ordered to be in readiness to return to London at a moment's notice.

Mr. Asquith is kept constantly informed of the developments by wireless.

Protected by mounted police, merchants took men to the docks and secured supplies. By this means a quantity of fruit and perishable goods was saved.

The Covent Garden Trade Union of porters has joined the strike demanding recognition of the Union and better conditions, but non-unionists have remained with employers. They say that with adequate protection the work of the market can be maintained. Trade Union pickets are actively at work.

A cargo of Argentine meat arrived at the London docks on the 27th May, and unloading operations were immediately begun under the protection of the police. The masters used motor lorries. The strikers were furious at this move, but were afraid to interfere as they might have done in the case of horses. The meat convoys reached Smithfield Market unmolested. They were escorted by strong bodies of police.

The Strike Committee has issued a manifesto protesting against the authorities accommodating the master and protecting the “Scabs.” It also protests against the use of the police and soldiers, and warns the Government that repressive action will lead to extremes on the part of the men. The manifesto further calls out all transport workers, and says it has cabled asking every international agency to take action.

The situation at the docks at midday on the 28th May was unchanged. Special police patrols were conspicuous, and were much resented by the strikers. Business at Smithfield Market was almost normal, and there was no difficulty in distributing meat throughout the metropolis. Chilled beef has risen from 2d. to 4d. a stone, but other prices are unchanged.

A dock manager on the 3rd June described the men as “stamping back to work.” The Port of London authority has already secured thousand of men. One Company wanted 280 and received 15,005 applications. Masters met and considered the reply to the Conciliation proposal. It is officially announced that the Port of London authority secured 5,500 men this morning and the 2,000 have been taken on permanently. It is stated that shipowners at the meeting with the Cabinet Ministers yesterday showed firm resistance to compulsory arbitration, but discussed the possibility of federating employers to secure uniform conditions employment.

Several papers publish editorial articles rejoicing at the apparent collapse of the movement which is the first of recent great strikes which has not achieved speedy victory. They declare that the leaders overshot the mark by dragging into lightermen's quarrel thousands of dock labourers and carmen whose heart was never in the dispute.

Mediterranean Strategy.

Reuter wires from Malta.—A Naval and Military review of 6,600 men was held in the presence of Mr. Asquith, Mr. and Mrs. Churchill and many Generals and Admirals. The review offered a magnificent spectacle, especially the Naval Brigade and field guns. Mr. Churchill spoke a few words to every officer on parade.

Reuter wires from Malta.—The Lords of the Admiralty have concluded their inspection. They have issued a statement expressing satisfaction at the efficiency of the organisation of the dockyard. It is their intention to make full use of the facilities of this important naval base, the value of which to the British navy is of a permanent character. They propose to assign such proportion of repairing and refitting work to Malta Dockyard as will keep it in a normal condition of activity and capable at all times of attending to the needs in peace and war of any fleet cruising or operating in the Mediterranean. All necessary measures will be taken for its continued security. After paying tribute to the efficiency of the manoeuvres of the destroyers and submarines, the statement says that submarines will play an increasingly important part in the defence of the island.

Statements that Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill are proceeding to Tunis to examine the question of Franco-British co-operation in the Mediterranean are unfounded. The visit will be purely one of courtesy.

Reuter wires from Malta.—Lord Kitchener has sailed for Egypt in H. M.'s cruiser Hampshire.

Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill have left for Bizerta on board the Admiralty yacht Enchantress.

The Matin publishes statistics of the naval position in the Mediterranean, which show that till 1920 France without the aid of Great Britain will hold absolute supremacy.

Reuter wires from Bizerta.—Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill have arrived. They received cordial welcome. A visit was made to the dockyard this afternoon while to-night a banquet will be given on board the Admiralty yacht Enchantress.

Reuter wires from Bizerta.—Messrs. Asquith and Churchill left for Gibraltar on the evening of the 3rd June.

The Daily Telegraph states that the question of the British position in the Mediterranean will be considered by the Cabinet at an early date. All Government departments affected, besides many influential officers of the army and the navy, regard the Admiralty decision as most grave, only justifiable on the most urgent grounds and requiring detailed consideration before an irrevocable step is taken.

Anglo-German Relations.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—Baron Marschall von Bieberstein was entertained at a farewell banquet by the German Colony on the occasion of his departure to take up the post of German Ambassador in London. Alluding to his appointment in London, the Baron said, "My path is steep and stony, but faithful to the orders of my Imperial master, I shall proceed thereon. I will place all my strength at the disposal of the Kaiser and the Empire."

Lord Haldane is returning to London without having visited Berlin.

Egypt.

Lord Kitchener's first annual report as His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in Egypt is an interesting review. His Lordship records with pleasure the general progress of the country after his eleven years of absence, and notes with satisfaction the recent calming of political feeling, and the fact that the consideration of practical reforms has apparently become more interesting to the majority of the people than abstruse political questions. Lord Kitchener warns the Muhammadans against the weakening effects of political faction.

The report further says that a constant stream of immigration from all the surrounding parts of Africa is entering the Sudan, and Lord Kitchener anticipates that the population will be doubled in the next five years. His Lordship adds that when the Sudan was conquered, the whole population was practically starving. Now there is hardly a poor man in the Sudan.

Afghanistan.

There is suspension of hostilities on the Khost frontier. Various Mullahs are said to be exercising their influence to induce the Mangals and Jadrans to make their submission to the Amir.

China.

A telegram to the Times from Peking states that the loan negotiations have reached a deadlock.

The Advisory Council has reconsidered its assent to the terms of supervision and requires a modification which the banks have refused. The papers are accusing the British and allied banks and the British Government of attempting to destroy the independence of China through financial subjection. The Chinese are at present endeavouring to raise an internal loan.

At a meeting between the Minister of Finance and bankers, the doyen of the bankers said he hoped that this would be successful. The allegations that the British banks and the Government were pressing a burdensome loan upon China was, he said, untrue, and it was injurious to the good name of the British.

Consular reports state that provincial opposition to a foreign loan is assuming an anti-Foreign character, particularly in Szechuan where mystic rites and dancing are in progress similar to those at the time of the Boxer rising.

The Government has drawn only fifteen hundred of the three million taels the Six-Power group placed at its disposal.

The National Council is in favour of securing as large a sum as possible by means of a system of National Bonds, with a view to reducing as far as possible the amount required from foreign sources, thus allaying provincial opposition to a foreign loan.

Tibet.

News from Lhasa is still meagre but the Pioneer's correspondent confirms the report that the Chinese are hard-pressed. An enormous gathering of armed Tibetans seems to have taken place at the capital.

The Statesman's special correspondent at Kalimpong wired on the 4th instant.—A Gyantse letter states that the majority of Chinese at Lhasa flatly refused to entertain any proposal for peace, and have challenged the Tibetans to encounter in a pitched battle on the 31st of last month at any place the latter might name. The priest warriors of Sera monastery have undertaken to fight, and the Khambas to cut off the water supply. The Peace Mission which left Gyantse on 14th May headed by Lieutenant Lal Bahadur, is said to have reached Lhasa. The pro-Chinese Tibetan Dignitaries and their adherents have been driven to desperation and have resolved to encourage the Chinese to continue to fight, for they argue that when the Chinese yield to the Tibetan demands their fate would be doomed. A private letter from Peking says that President Yuan-Shi-Kai has approached the late Dowager Empress to negotiate an amicable settlement between Tibet and outer Mongolia with China, whose influence over her co-religionists is generally believed to outweigh any momentary measures. The Tibetan Lamas in Peking have also been called in to give advice, and they suggested to appoint a delegation to the Dalai Lama which will be entrusted with the delivery of important missives. The president concurred with the view and provisions are being made for their departure at an early date.

Indians in South Africa.

Reuter wires from Capetown.—In the Union Assembly on the 30th May, Mr. Smuts moved the second reading of the Immigration Bill. He said, it embodied the understanding reached with the Imperial Government in 1910 with regard to Asiatics. The difficulty the administration was confronted with was considerable. After much consideration, Government had decided to adopt the suggestions of the Colonial Office, which the Government of India supported, to apply the Australian education test which could be applied so as to encourage whites and exclude Asiatics. They intended to carry out the arrangements reached with the Imperial Government to allow the entry of educated professional Asiatics in limited numbers while preventing the influx of Asiatics. The Imperial and Indian Governments had seen the Bill and were most anxious to see it passed. The Government also intended at the instance of the Imperial Government to introduce an amendment relating to Asiatics domiciled in South Africa.

The Opium Trade.

The Times, on the 3rd instant, in an article discussing the recent appeal of the opium merchants in India to the Government of India requesting the discontinuance of the sale of opium for China proceeds to an exhaustive review of the situation from various standpoints, that of Indian Finance, opium merchants and the political situation. The journal points out that the Government of India is in a remarkable position, being confronted with the united demands of the Chinese Government, the Anti-Opium Societies in England and Indian opium merchants to cease selling the drug for China, though the motives prompting these demands are widely different. Jointly, however, they constitute a formidable request. The Times thinks the public in India and England will be in full agreement on one point, and that is that though the Chinese Government have been unable to fulfil their part of the undertaking, the traffic must stop. The question is at this stage it seems to us that the Indian merchants have a right to be heard. As the result of the Anglo-Chinese Agreements of 1907 and 1911, the Government of India have benefited by huge surpluses resulting from the high prices of Government opium based on the expectations produced by the Agreements. It is impossible for Great Britain to insist on the right of entry of India opium because there is now no central authority in China capable of enforcing the right. We recognise the interests to be considered. First are those of India, as a whole. If, however, the continuation of the sales causes a collapse of prices, India will receive little benefit, while the merchants will be crushed. The Government of India have sold a Government product at enormously enhanced prices on the strength of the agreement the fulfilment of which they cannot now procure. They have pocketed the profits gleefully. In common fairness, they cannot now proceed to ruin those who trusted them.

According to a Simla telegram, dated the 4th June, there has been no great development in the opium situation except that the Government of India have received reports from several opium merchants in Singapore and Calcutta urging the Government not to suspend their sales. The suspension of sales, they allege, will affect the opium trade with Singapore and other adjoining countries.

Viceroy's Council.

A good deal of interest attaches to several non-official Bill, dealing with problems of social reform which Messrs. Mudholkar, Dadabhoi and others propose to bring forward before the Imperial Legislative Council. It is believed that the Hon. Mr. Dadabhoi's Bill for the protection of women and girls incorporates among other important provisions the raising of the age of consent to 15 years. Mr. Dadabhoi has been quick in perceiving that the state of things that now exists can only be remedied by raising the age so as to give protection to girls between 12 and 16 years provided such change does not affect the question of marriage. The main object of the Bill is to raise the age of consent to 16 years. It does not affect the present exception to Section 375 of the Penal Code protecting the rights of husbands over girl-wives of and over 12 years of age. This important measure will also ensure the support of orthodox Indian opinion in the country. It is understood that Government have obtained a few opinions adverse to such change but there is a vast majority in its favour. Mr. Dadabhoi has no doubt taken upon himself a somewhat onerous task, but it is one in which he will doubtless secure the co-operation and support of all well-wishers of the country. The Bill will be placed before the Imperial Council in September.

Council Regulations.

The Hon. Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu and Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee were accorded an interview by His Excellency Lord Carmichael, on the 31st May, and their suggestions for the expansion of the regulation as it stands concerning the electorates were most sympathetically received. On the 3rd June they both had an interview with the Governor as well as each member of the Executive Council individually. The allocation of the 50 seats as framed at present is 2 experts, 26 elected and 22 nominated, of whom not more than 17 shall be Government officials, while the conditions of representation are residence in the division as well as service of three years, either on a Municipality or a District Board. The latter condition necessarily restricts the sphere of selection and it is this disability that both Mr. Basu and Mr. Banerjee are striving to remove. This is the crux of the question under consideration and both are aiming at an expansion of the elective conditions. The suggestions which will be put forward at the Council meeting to-morrow may be summarised as follows:—(a) Removal of these disabilities and (b) an adequate representation of middle class interests not by trenching upon the interests of others but by a limitation of the Government power of nomination.

All-India Muslim League.

The following resolutions were passed in the Council of the All-India Muslim League on the 3rd June.—The Council of the All-India Muslim League expresses its utmost surprise at the uncalculated and unjust remarks of Mr. Montagu, Under-Secretary of State for India, when moving the second reading of the Government of India Bill in the House of Commons that it was a mistake to talk of the Muhammadans of India as though they were a homogeneous nationality. The Muhammadans of Bengal had no relation with those outside Bengal. These remarks have outraged the feeling not only of the Mussalmans of Bengal but of the entire community throughout India and the Council of the League apprehends that the statements made by a responsible member of His Majesty's Government, which are wholly contrary to facts, may pass for truth and may cause great injury to the cause of Mussalmans who have been authoritatively declared by the Government of India to possess a distinct political status of their own as a community in India. (a) The Council of the All-India Muslim League is thankful to the Secretary of State for India for having acceded to the united wishes of the Muhammadan community by accepting the principle of the Wakf Alal Awaqid Bill of the Hon. Mr. Jinnah and trusts that the Government of India will hasten the progress of the Bill and make such modifications therein as may recommend themselves to the community.

TETE À TETE

FORMAL applications with the necessary amount of deposit for the Hamdard Debentures are steadily coming in, though the progress is not as rapid as we may wish. We know there are many intending purchasers who had sent us informal intimations of their readiness to subscribe but have not yet formally done so, perhaps because they think there is no particular hurry about the matter. As we had said a fortnight ago, it is very important that the Hamdard should be launched into existence before the Government of India make their move to Delhi. For this purpose a fully equipped press has to be set up; and we cannot naturally place orders for machinery, type and other printing accessories unless we have in hand Rs 17,500 as deposit. The setting up of a new press in a new place will take considerable time. We trust the intending subscribers will realise the urgent nature of the undertaking and send in their applications with the deposit money as soon as they conveniently can. All those interested in the progress of our new venture will be glad to learn that an eminent Moslem lady and her youngest son have bought 300 and 200 shares, respectively, of the Hamdard Debentures. She has already won universal esteem and regard in this country for her great liberality towards all measures of public usefulness. Needless to say we are sincerely thankful to her for the spontaneous help she has extended to the new undertaking on which we have embarked. It will, we are sure, equally interest our sympathisers to know that many distinguished Moslem gentlemen have shown practical sympathy with our scheme by purchasing considerable number of shares. Our highest ambition, however, is that the number of the subscribers to the Debentures should be as large as possible, so that the greatest amount of popular sympathy and interest should be enlisted on behalf of our new journalistic programme.

SOME time ago we had called the attention of the Indian Government to the humiliating disability that the Transvaal Government had imposed on the Indian Moslems in South Africa.

We had shown how a Mussalman was liable to arrest and fine if he happened to have more than one wife. We regret to say that the disability continues to be imposed in all its irksome rigour. What is actually happening in those dismal regions dominated by the Little Africander and how His Majesty's Indian Muslim subjects are being treated are now a matter of History. We need not discuss the notorious regulations in detail, but in certain of their effects they are well worth pondering. A Judge of the Transvaal Supreme Court has laid it down that the Transvaal Law does not recognise the Muhammadan Law of marriage, that Mussalman wives are therefore not recognised as such, that for the purposes of the Immigration Law, a Mussalman Indian may elect to name any one of his wives (supposing him to have more than one) and that even though she may be the last married, she may enter the Transvaal to the exclusion of all the others. It is held that the clause providing for the admission of the wife of a non-prohibited immigrant does not include wives where there are more than one. Again, a Mussalman subject of H.M. the Sultan of Turkey is liable to the disabilities of Law 3 of 1885, including ineligibility even for the Municipal franchise, and inability to own fixed or landed property, while the Christian subjects of His Majesty enjoy perfect freedom of movement and the same rights and privileges as the free-born white colonist. We have reason to believe that all Ottomans, irrespective of creed and race, resent this humiliation and will see that the citizens of the Empire are treated with due respect abroad. Our primary concern is that the Indian Mussalmans in Africa should not be subjected to such iniquitous treatment. In spite of all that has been promised by responsible British statesmen in the way of relaxing the existing regulations, nothing effective has yet been done to break the bar sinister of colour and creed. The only remedy that we can think of under the circumstances is that similar regulations should be enforced by the Indian Government to bring home to the Little Africander the enormity of his arrogance and the danger that is creating for the future of the British Empire. The Indians have no reason to accept the existing inequality of conditions as a part of some immutable Law of Nature. The Imperial citizenship is a farce as long as they are treated like helots and pariahs in an integral part of the British Empire.

OFFICIAL ignorance in regard to the social life and habits of the people becomes, at times, decidedly alarming in some of its manifestations. But far worse, and even provoking, is the frame of mind that encourages a stolid indifference to facts and has a horror of all light and air outside the murky atmosphere of red-tapeism. For an illustration we cannot do better than refer to a recent answer of the Bombay Government in reply to a question asked by the Hon. Maulvi Rafi-ud-Din Ahmed in the Provincial Legislative Council. It appears that the food for the Hindu and the Moslem boarders of the Ahmedabad Training College is prepared in the same kitchen, where, in deference to the scruples of Hindu students, meat is an absolutely tabooed article of diet. The Moslem students have, in consequence, to go without their staple food; and naturally enough, they are wholly dissatisfied with the existing food arrangements in the boarding house. The Hon. Maulvi Rafi-ud-Din asked whether the Government was aware of the fact, and if so, whether it would direct the College authorities to make separate arrangements for Moslem students. The reply of the Government is a curious mixture of ignorance, indifference and evasion. According to the Moslem of Poona, the Government admitted that the Moslem boarders do not get meat in the boarding house, but in justification of the fact it made the ridiculous assertion that the Gujarat Moslems do not eat meat in their homes. Nothing can be more absurd and misleading than the plea with which the Bombay Government has thought fit to justify an absolutely unjustifiable state of things. We think our knowledge of the Gujarat Moslems is much more intimate and greater than that of the Bombay Government is ever likely to be, and we challenge it to prove the accuracy of its categorical assertion. As a matter of fact, the Government of Sir George Clarke has consistently disappointed the Mussalmans in some of their most natural and legitimate demands. We confess there is little hope that their wishes and sentiments will be sympathetically considered as long as the present official attitude of indifference is maintained. The food question, not very important in itself, is serious enough in some of its bearings. It could be easily settled to the satisfaction of the Moslem students by allowing separate food arrangements to be made. As far as we know, in most of the mixed boarding houses separate arrangements already exist. Apart from the natural objection of the Moslem students to eat the food prepared by a Hindu cook, who cannot be expected to conform to the hygienic and other rules prescribed by the Moslem religion, we cannot understand why the Training College authorities should force the Moslem boys to regulate the quality and quantity of their diet according to the Hindu dietary customs obtaining in Ahmedabad. We wish the Bombay Government may yet see the absurdity of its present attitude and reconsider the matter.

Gujarat Moslems and Their Diet.

A few months ago a crusade was started by the Tribune and the Panjabes of Lahore against what they styled "Urdu-Speaking Councillors." "Urdu-speaking Councillors" in the Panjab Legislative Council, with a decided dash of spitefulness behind it. It was not long before other stalwart "warriors" from various parts of the country joined the crusaders of the Panjab; and ever since then the section of the Press they patronise has been ringing with the din and clamour of their familiar war-cries. It is one of the most interesting features of the "Nationalist" journalism that its judgments in regard to all facts and events which do not smack of the spirit of the orthodox Swaraj, are, with a remarkable cleverness, tuned to a single note. The "Nationalist" organs in the country are always disconcertingly and almost suspiciously unanimous when, for instance, any subject or scheme which may have aroused Moslem sympathies, is to be pelted with mud. It is difficult to recall a single occasion on which any organised Moslem effort designed for the good of the community may have met with the "Nationalist" sympathy or even neighbourly good will and tolerance. The usual method adopted in all such cases is to damn the whole affair with faint praise. As to a Moslem grievance, it is, of course, treated with studied silence, for it cannot be worthy of any public discussion unless it is "Indian National." It is worth while studying these methods in detail, even though it be for no other reason than that of learning an art for the art's sake. We are perfectly sure it would be infinitely interesting to a lay mind to understand how some garrulous old wag of a paper routes out a most innocent-looking detail of a useful measure, turns it inside out, develops a frown and a sneer, insinuates some paltry motive into its purpose and sends it forth, labelled with some tremendous phrase, to go the round of the "Nationalist" Press. The subsequent career of that harmless detail is full of thrilling adventure. It traverses the whole country from Cape Comorin to Kashmir. It has to step on from quotation to quotation on a light fantastic toe till it completes the cycle of its erratic destiny. At last it reaches its starting place where it is solemnly buried with a sermon. The Hon. Mr. Bhurguri's Bill for the Education Cess has only just undergone its funeral ceremonies. The Moslem protests against Mr. Montagu's speech are being breathlessly hounded to their doom. "The Urdu-speaking Councillors" were laid on the funeral pyre only last week when the Panjabes gave them the quietus by quoting itself from the Bengalees. It is difficult to estimate how many facts, measures, and movements of "non-Nationalist" origin are annually done to death by quotation. The campaign against "the Urdu-speaking Councillors" has two distinct motives behind it. In the first place, Urdu is in itself a thing very exasperating to the "Nationalist" temper. The matters are aggravated still further when it is spoken by a Mussalman Councillor, even though he has been returned by a "mixed electorate." We are sorry we have to say this in plain words, for the furious attacks that have been made on some of the most respectable members of the Panjab Council cannot be explained on any rational hypothesis. We hope the Panjabes will be the last to maintain that a knowledge of English connotes in all cases a capacity for sound and clear thinking. Under the existing procedure of the Councils ignorance of English is admittedly a handicap. But, then, we should not forget that there are several Legislative Councillors in the country who, with all their pretentious knowledge of English, need a systematic schooling in the elements of Logic. If the "Dictionary of Names and Places" and the "Specimens of English Eloquence" could alone furnish the necessary equipment for Indian political life, we would have plenty of embryo statesmen fit to run a vaster Empire than ours. It is a queer commentary on the quality of education imparted through the medium of a foreign language that culture, sanity, balance and breadth of outlook have ceased to have any meaning apart from the loud and emphatic phrases of men of imperfect mental training confused by a doubtful knowledge of English.

It was in a thoughtless moment that Mr. Montagu indulged in his passion for uncompromising phrase and round-

Race or Religion. ed period at the expense of the Indian Mussalmans. The serious protests that his reference to Moslem "homogeneity" have evoked in every part of the country serve to show how necessary it is for a responsible politician directly concerned with the governance of India to see that his ideas do not run away with his tongue. What may have been a merely harmless exercise in self-expression on the part of a literary dilettante has proved very unfortunate in its effects and has caused needless pain and irritation. We hope Mr. Montagu, who had expressed unimpeachably sound views on the character of Islam on an earlier occasion, will himself be the first to withdraw what he was led to say recently. It is rather amusing to think in this connection that some organs of pan-Hinduism have hailed the remarks of Mr. Montagu with extreme gratification. They are now solemnly engaged in the task of destroying Moslem unity by the simple and easy method of denying its existence. Recently the Leader of Allahabad quotes "a correspondent" who is wroth with the "Moslem leaders" on account of their strongly protesting against the implications contained in Mr. Montagu's speech and loudly sneers at them for their "vain and hollow pretensions." "A correspondent" fortifies his conscience and judgment by quoting a peculiarly splenetic attack on the Mussalmans recently made by the Madras Times. We are familiar enough with spiteful manifestations of this kind. They are manifestly intended to wound, but we are sure, they only amuse the Mussalmans. There is, however, one aspect of this scandalous game of malice which calls for serious attention. It is absolutely useless to expect a rapid growth of good will and understanding between the two communities as long as a certain type of papers exist to sow seeds of mischief. What we are rather anxiously concerned about is the future of the younger generations of the Hindus who are being trained on this sorry stuff. Let us look at the matter closely. Islam is not a congress but a creed, not based on accidents of geography, colour or political expediency, but on the immutable verities of human nature. It has bound together its votaries with a tie stronger than any yet fashioned by colour or race or even common political history. To ignore it is to make light of the forces that religion has brought to bear on the men for moulding them into united social groups. The Indian Mussalmans may not be the descendants of a single tribe, but they have been brought up in the atmosphere of a common culture and common ideals and common purposes of life. The religious affinities that bind them into a homogeneous whole are stronger than those of ethnology. The Hindus have themselves tacitly borne witness to the unifying power that a common religion confers, by claiming 'the untouchables' as Hindus. That the "untouchables" have not been effectively hinduised and, therefore, are actually out of touch with Hindu aspirations, is outside the scope of our argument." What we want to make clear is that the efforts of a section of the Hindu Press to show as if there existed no solidarity amongst the Mussalmans is mischievous. What the character of the men will be who start with such ridiculous notions about a community with whom they will have to deal for the purposes of common political existence, is a matter of speculation. We should think those who are guiding Hindu opinion were alive to the fearful anomalies that render the Hindu society so gigantic a muddle, and would turn their attention to making it elastic in every part instead of indulging in mad and senseless onslaughts on the Mussalmans and their "homogeneity."

The Comrade.

"A Mockery of British Justice."

FORTUNATELY it is seldom that we come across instances in which a grievous and flagrant miscarriage of justice may be said to have taken place in this country. Scrupulous care and impartiality with which on the whole the law is administered in British India, constitute the real bulwark of the peace of the country and the security of the British rule. England's record of achievements in this country is both varied and great. None can see without a certain feeling of hope and elation the rapidly shifting scenes of modern Indian history, the expansion of intellectual horizons, the vitalising movements of thought, the growth of the ideals of political unity and social reconstruction, the wholesome stress and toil of effort. All this intellectual and moral energy is due to the impulse that has been communicated to an inert society by a culture of new and vigorous type. The representatives of this culture may well be proud of having initiated a process of such magnitude and scope. The real glory of England, however, is not that she has planted the seeds of fruitful, progressive and liberal ideas in this country, but that she has striven to lay, deep and solid, the foundations of equity in the relations between the society and the State. No one with a full knowledge of the great political systems that have perished in the gulf of Time, can for a moment imagine that a perfect harmony of such relations is within the scope of human achievement. Still, however, the conception of the law as something impersonal, as the expression of the social conscience and absolutely free from the grip of the forces commonly known as "Privilege," is essentially modern; and this conception has materially helped in the shaping of the principles that have been applied to the governance of this country. The magnificent system of law that has been laboriously reared for the administration of even-handed justice between man and man is, in the last resort, the only strength and the final vindication of the British rule. The number of Englishmen who fail to realise this and prate about Efficiency and Prestige, as though they summed up a new and better formula of statecraft, is unfortunately growing. We wonder if they have ever tried to inquire into the nature of the nostrums they prescribe. Their highest ambition is that the machine should work smoothly, and they recommend, however unconsciously, the application of brute force in settling grave moral and social issues. In short, they insist on Expediency, which they conceive to be something different from justice, as the final test and justification of the policy of a State. It is, however, a very dangerous doctrine that they preach. It strikes at the root of the principles that have won for the British Empire in the East its only sanction—the acquiescence of the governed. Take away the sense of security that is based on the implicit belief of millions in the good faith and sense of justice of their rulers and the Empire will crumble like a house of cards. It is because the people of India believe that they live under just laws and that those laws, in spite of their proverbial delays and the cumbrous and expensive procedure of the Courts that dispense them, can be freely invoked, that the loyalty of India is such a constant, active and spontaneous element in her relations with England. It is the most vital duty of British statesmanship to keep this belief unimpaired. It needs no special gift of political insight to perceive that with this belief is bound up the existence of the British rule.

As we have already said, cases of flagrant and deliberate perversion of justice are happily of rare occurrence. The Executive and Judicial services of the country are, on the whole, composed of men of great integrity, who are mainly actuated by a high sense of public duty. Any lapses from the high standard of rectitude that is so carefully maintained not only dishonour the individuals but also tend to discredit the great Service to which they belong. It is, therefore, the most obvious and imperative duty of the Government to visit the offenders with swift and salutary punishment. Neither the Government nor the people can view with equanimity a state of things that might tolerate the existence of dishonest and unscrupulous officials or leave a patent wrong unrighted. The only prestige that should be guarded with jealous care is the prestige of British justice. We have been led into these general considerations at length, because we have read the report of a case of a peculiarly atrocious character from Burma, in which the guardians of the law themselves are alleged to have conspired to defeat the ends of justice. The facts of the case have been published by the Burma Critic in its issue of the 28th April 1912. The Editor, Mr. Arnold, the son of the late Sir Edwin Arnold, seems to have collected the facts with marvellous patience, industry and devotion to the cause of right. He boldly vouches for their truth and we have no reason to doubt his transparent disinterestedness and his veracity. Before making any comments of our own, we will briefly recapitulate the ghastly tale of woe and wrong as disclosed by the Burma Critic.

In the month of April 1911, a Muhammadan Malayan couple, Malassa and his wife Fatima, resident in Kampong Tengah, Victoria Point, Tenasserim, sent their daughter Aniah to stay with one Me Sone, a neighbour. According to her mother the age of the girl was under ten; and according to medical evidence, which was based on a subsequent examination, the child was much below the age of puberty. Within a mile or two of her parents' house lived a planter, a certain Captain MacCormick. What type of man this planter is has been fully described by the Burma Critic. Says our contemporary—"MacCormick is just the type of man that any country—especially an Oriental one—is better without. An overbearing, violent-tempered man, intemperate in his habits, a loose liver, a boastful bully who has assaulted even Europeans, has thrashed the natives, has gone about armed with revolver and, in short, has terrorised the neighbourhood." It would be well to remember that he "has been for a long time an intimate and apparently valued friend of Mr. G. P. Andrew, J.C.S., Officiating Deputy Commissioner at Mergui." The girl Aniah appears to have attracted the attention of MacCormick. He had spoken of her as a "beauty" and had made some efforts to get her, child as she was. The woman Me Sone, with whom Aniah was sent to live by her parents, was the mistress of a Mr. Clarke, then Assistant to MacCormick, and she was then living in Clarke's house. One evening soon after the girl's arrival, MacCormick called at Clarke's and found the child playing with another child in the compound. He forthwith lifted her up in his arms and carried her away to his house. Here we must quote our contemporary to bring into clear relief the hideousness of the outrage of which the "boastful bully" became subsequently guilty. "Now, there is not a shadow of doubt," says the Burma Critic, "that MacCormick abducted the child and that he did so, as we allege, for the purpose of subsequently raping her, as he did a few days later according to the child's sworn statement, which was not shaken by five hours of cross examination before the D. S. P. later on; which evidence is corroborated by the mother's testimony and the medical examination of two Doctors. But leaving aside the charge of rape for the moment, what is the accused's explanation of his taking possession of the child? It is the most amazing and incredible explanation conceivable. We are sorry to be obliged to write plainly, but the facts cannot be boggled. MacCormick asserts that the child was suffering from gonorrhoea, and that her mother had made her prostitute herself to coolies, and that, discovering her condition, he took pity on her, and undertook her treatment for the ailment he declares she had contracted. In refutation of this monstrous excuse we have not only the mother's testimony as to the virginity of the child when she left home. This might be discounted. We have medical evidence which it is quite impossible to print proving that Aniah could not have been living as a prostitute. It was a physical impossibility. That is final."

The facts of the case, then, are that MacCormick took possession of the child about the middle of April 1911, that for about three months he not only kept her in his house, but refused access to her parents, that he drove them or their messengers, or had them driven away, from his house with violence. A few weeks after the abduction the father of Aniah fell ill. He sent his brother and sister-in-law to bring the girl. MacCormick drove them back. When it was recognised that Malassa, the father, was really dying another attempt was made. He wanted to see his daughter before his death. Again, access to the child was not allowed and the father died without seeing her. "She was not allowed to go even to his funeral." "Now what could this mean?" asks our contemporary, "what could this mean but one thing? It must mean that MacCormick, having criminally assaulted the child, dared not allow her out of his custody, at any rate till the worst of the physical effects of his crime had been remedied. Aniah's statement bears this out. She declares that she was medically treated by Ma Pe Yin for her injuries during the whole period of her detention."

By the beginning of July the matter of abduction and detention of Aniah had become the subject of comment in the neighbourhood. After the death of the father about the middle of June, the mother tried to lay the information before the local authorities. Her movements were being watched by MacCormick's spies, but she finally managed to reach the D. Magistrate's office by travelling by night hidden in the bottom of a boat. On the 12th July she swore her information before the Magistrate, stating the facts of the abduction. She also stated that she had tried to see the Deputy Commissioner who was then staying at MacCormick's house, but had been driven away. The Magistrate, who had, we understand, written a long letter to Mr. Andrew on the 3rd July detailing the reports that were reaching him, handed the proceedings over to the Sub Inspector of Police for inquiry. The inquiry was next day taken up by Mr. Sherard, the Inspector of Police, who went to MacCormick's house to bring the child away. "On his return with the child he reported to the Magistrate that the accused had shouted at the witnesses while he (Sherard) was making his inquiry to make them give evidence to please him." The mother was sent for, who at once asked for the medical examination of the child. "This was done at once; the Sub Assistant Surgeon reporting that the child had been outraged and there were certain signs of hurt." Two days later the girl came with her mother and made a sworn statement charging MacCormick with abduction and rape.

No warrant was as yet issued for the arrest of the accused. On the 18th July, Lieutenant Andrew McLean Finnie, I. A., the D.S.P., arrived at Victoria Point and took over the papers and the conduct of the case as head of the Police. The D. S. P. saw the D. S. P. on his arrival and handed him a letter saying that MacCormick, in his opinion, should be arrested. Mr. Finnie saw the Magistrate again in the afternoon and said "that it was a 'funny' case; that he was going to take the two charges, abduction and rape, together; that it was hard to prove rape after three months; that he would devote all his attention to the 'rape' part of the case and that, if there were not evidence enough on that point he would throw out both cases." As regards the "funny" of the case, we cannot do better than quote the Burma Critic. Says our contemporary:—

"A funny case?" Does Mr. Finnie, an officer holding the King's Commission, and presumably what is called a gentleman, really think it "funny" that any man should abduct and criminally assault a child of ten and deny us her dying father right of her, to keep secret the physical proof of his crime? Does he think it his duty as a representative of the Empire to strive from the first, as it is abundantly clear he did, to keep the enquiry into the accused's guilt; not only to allow him to escape but to help him to escape? Is that Mr. Finnie's conception of his duty to the King and the Empire? For shame! It is not only a disgrace to the Empire but it is that the way of an officer should be the moral tone which it is his honour to maintain. It is this, Mr. Finnie's idea of ign? We venture to think that he will discover very shortly that His Majesty's Secretary of State for India and Lord Haldane and the Army Council do not share his view of the funniness of this disgraceful travesty of British justice.

It would seem that Mr. Finnie from the time he took up the case did all he could to burk and quash the charges. The S. D. Magistrate issued the warrant on the charge of abduction on the 19th July. The D. S. P. went so far as to try to intimidate the Magistrate into withdrawing it. Failing this, he wired to Mr. Andrew, the Deputy Commissioner in Mergui, for instructions. "On the 20th the accused was admitted to bail on a non-bailable charge by the orders of the Deputy Commissioner." During the Police inquiry the D. S. P. and Mr. Andrew were exchanging cipher telegrams; and it is worth noting that the D. S. P. refused to let the S. D. Magistrate see the papers until the latter insisted on seeing them. "On or about the 23rd July the D. S. P. went out on tour taking the papers with him, and they appear to have been entirely re-written. Mr. Finnie's finding was that (1) no criminal offence had been committed with regard to the first charge under 363, I. P. C., and (2) that the charge of rape was false."

Now we come to the inquiry that was made into the case by the Deputy Commissioner. It has already been hinted at above that intimate relations existed between Mr. Andrew and the accused. Mr. Andrew stayed at MacCormick's house during his visits to Victoria Point. He was, it is stated, staying with his friend shortly after the alleged rape. As the Burma Critic says, it is difficult to believe that he did not see the child or know of her detention by his friend. At all events, his allowing bail to be granted in a non-bailable offence and his telegrams to Mr. Finnie go to show that he was anxious that his friend should be saved. About three weeks passed before the case was to come up for hearing. Meanwhile the complainants, convinced that the hearing would be unfair, sent a lengthy petition to the Commissioner praying that the case should be transferred to Rangoon. The petition was sent under a registered cover and consequently it may be presumed that it safely reached the Commissioner. He, however, seems to have consigned it to the waste paper basket. About the same time two long telegrams were sent to the Lieutenant-Governor with the same object. In addition to the complainants there are four witnesses in whose presence the telegrams were sent. "We have been officially informed," says the Burma Critic, "that no such appeals reached His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor. As they were sent, the natural query is, who stopped them and where were they stopped? That is a grave question which will have to be answered sooner or later." As regards the character of the inquiry and the manner in which it was conducted, we read:—

The facts before us indicate that he (the Deputy Commissioner) compared with Mr. Finnie to burk the case; that he conducted it in camera; that he refused to heed the protest of the complainants that the interpreter employed was a paid parasite of MacCormick and did in fact deliberately mistranslate; that of the witnesses for the prosecution only those called by the D. S. P. and not even all of them, were allowed to give evidence; that in a word the whole enquiry was an outrageous make-believe and a mockery of what he is nominally representative, the fairplay and judicial honour associated with the name of England.

At this "judicial farce" the poor and helpless complainants were absolutely unrepresented by any lawyer. It appears that they were in communication with some lawyer in Rangoon when they learnt through a telegram that the Government would entertain a lawyer on their behalf. And just a day before they were about to start for Mergui, they were informed through another telegram that "Government would not entertain a lawyer." Mr. Andrew afterwards explained that "the Commissioner had refused to grant more than Rs. 100 and no lawyer would take up the case for that." Why was this solemn promise to allow legal advice made in the name of Government? Was not the question of legal aid into consideration when the promise was telegraphed? Could any expense be too heavy to satisfy the ends of justice? Seeing that the hapless victims of the alleged outrage had no time to make arrangements for securing legal advice, even if they possessed the means, we are constrained to think the whole proceeding wears a gruesome aspect in regard to the impartiality of the officer in charge of the case. The Burma Critic thinks it looks like the meanest of tricks. "If a trick," says our contemporary, "—and it looks uncommonly like it—what a mean, cowardly ruse! What a contemptible manoeuvre to balk the poor and friendless subjects of the King."

Mr. Andrew began his inquiry on the 21st August and concluded it on the 22nd. The accused was discharged. A Muhammadan advocate of Rangoon sent a petition in the rape case to the Lieutenant-Governor, on which an order was passed on the 27th October to the effect that His Honour had "satisfied himself that there is no truth in the allegations made in the petition and declines to take further action in the matter."

These are in bare outline the facts of the case as stated by the Burma Critic. Without these facts before us, we could have hardly thought such "a mockery of British Justice" to be possible in British India. Facts are, however, more gruesome and ghastly in their realism than any chapter of horrors in a work of realistic fiction. We need make no comment of ours on the horrible outrage of which a child of ten years is said to have been the victim. The facts are telling enough. MacCormick is the type of a "bully" with whom any civilised race of men would be ashamed to own a kinship. That he should have been protected and saved, as is alleged, by friends clothed with official authority renders the miscarriage of justice a crime the enormity of which it is difficult to estimate in sober language. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, as the Burma Critic says, has been hoodwinked in this matter. But should the matter be allowed to rest here? In the interest of justice and good government, clearly not. We earnestly hope some non-official member of the Imperial Legislative Council will draw the attention of the Government of India to this scandalous case. It stands in need of a searching and exhaustive inquiry. We equally trust the Government will not withhold its sanction to a public inquiry into the conduct of the officials who are alleged to have been guilty of a conspiracy against a poor, hapless woman and her outraged child in order to save their common friend from the consequences of his guilt. We can not see how the Government can refuse this demand without appearing to trifle with the momentous issues, such as, the impartial administration of justice, the honesty and rectitude of responsible public servants and the protection of the honour and freedom of poor Indian subjects of the King.

We cannot close this repellent story of crime and iniquity, as told by the Burma Critic, without referring to the lewd flippancy with which the subject has been treated by another Anglo-Indian paper, the Bassett News. It sets out to whitewash MacCormick and his official friends, though it admits that "the records of the case are not before us" and, therefore, it does not know whether "MacCormick admitted carrying off the girl." But whether the girl was carried off or not, the whole conception is full of romantic possibilities, and this chronicler of MacCormickian adventures bursts forth into a fine melody of feeling:—

"A langourous daughter of Ind This wild Irishman met a beautiful girl Anah, with large lustrous liquid brown eyes. The brown eyes made him think of the colleens in his native Irish bog. "Bedad," said he, "you'd be a pretty decoration for my house!" And he lifted her in his arms and carried her a mile or thereabouts to his bungalow. The girl evidently enjoyed the adventure for when police arrived on the scene she sat on his knee and said she was very happy. . . ."

The police, it may be noted, arrived about three months after "the adventure" began. The rhapsody about the "eyes," "the Irishman" and "the Irish bog" is of a piece with the rest of the picture. "A langourous daughter of Ind!" Whether she could be a pretty picture for the house of "the Irishman" or not, she was, as we are told, a helpless victim to his lust. The legacy of the Bassin News is only another facet of the same pose, the pose that the low type of the European adopts in his dealings with men who differ from him in the colour of their skins. It is the pose of men who lynch negroes in America and Africa or burn them alive. Perhaps the Bassin News has yet to learn that the Indians do not lack the sort of artistic sense that is roused to beautiful perceptions by visualising the things seen, and that they certainly understand the theory and uses of all decorative Arts, whether ancient or modern. But they have not yet divorced their Art from a moral purpose.

The Moslem University.

A VERY remarkable communication was published in the Institute Gazette of the 22nd May which was bound to provide food for serious thought for every thinking Mussalman interested in the movement for a Muhammadan University. It was a letter of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk Bahadur, the Honorary Secretary of the Aligarh College, whose great perseverance in the face of physical and mental ailments must have touched the hearts of all Mussalmans and shamed not a few of the younger men who possess every qualification for communal work except the desire to do it. We were startled by the shocking news that, owing to excessive physical and mental work even during the illness which necessitated his partial withdrawal from the work of the Honorary Secretary's office, his left wrist and the fingers of his left hand were paralysed and perceptible weakness was felt both physically and mentally. We were, however, relieved, far beyond anything that can be said, by the telegram we had received from the Nawab Sahib in reply to our enquiries in which he stated that he was much better and that there was no danger now. Who would not admire the courage and unselfish devotion to work of the community of an old man of 73 who kept the shocking news of the attack away from the papers for more than a week and only incidentally referred to it when he had considerably improved. The news that he bids goodbye to the important task of discussing and deliberating upon the constitution of the Moslem University and its recently drafted regulations will be received with speechless sorrow throughout the community, for the hearts of the Mussalmans will be as sad at this farewell as that of the Nawab Sahib clearly appears to be, in spite of the great self-control which is evident from the language of his published letter. We trust the Nawab Sahib has many years of mellow wisdom and sage counsel for his community before him, but knowing the gloomier possibilities we agree with the Nawab Sahib in believing that, after his recent ailment, it was his evident duty to speak out plainly about a matter the importance of which to the present and the future of 70 million people cannot be exaggerated. He was compelled to thrust aside all mere conventions, and although we have no doubt that some of his remarks must have caused pain to some people, we trust they realized that the mood in which the Nawab Sahib's letter was written was not one in which considerations for the feeling of individuals, however able and well meaning, could override the much greater necessity of considering the good of a whole people.

The Nawab believes that those who have had the drafting of the constitution and the regulations have hitherto paid greater regard to the interests of the teaching staff than those of the community, and while he praised their experience, ability and industry and expressed his gratitude to them on behalf of the community, he was compelled to say that the procedure adopted by the members of the Constitution Committee of allowing defects in the Constitution to remain in the earlier drafts in the hope that they would be removed later on in the course of discussion in the interests of the community, has not been an unmixed blessing. The constitution of the University has now been fairly well discussed, and we trust that in the form in which it was submitted to the Government at Simla it would work satisfactorily to the community and to the Government. But the regulations which have been submitted to the members of the Committee are, in the opinion of the Nawab Sahib, full of such defects and we entirely agree with him in this estimate of the draft. The Nawab Sahib has not attacked the motives of any member of the Committee nor do we feel called upon to do so. But there are prejudices which are unconscious just as there are prejudices which are conscious, and the former seem to have strongly biased those who have been responsible for drafting the constitution and the regulations.

A very able and enthusiastic educationist remarked about our constitution that it was exceedingly elaborate. But it was explained to him that checks and balances are most necessary in a case like this when a community like the Mussalmans rejects the system of education provided for by the Government and, foregoing much of its contribution to the revenues of the State employed for education, provides a very large fund for a University of its own in which, although it is the Mussalmans that are to be educated and in a way that would be essentially Islamic, much of the teaching and the direct management would for long have to be in the hands of non-Mussalmans and non-Indians. It is true that in Europe and America it is the teaching staff that has the larger share in the management and control of Universities. But in Europe and America the teaching staff is of the same religion and same nation as the scholars of the University and the people are under a Government composed entirely of men of their own nationality. Here in India the conditions are totally different, and if non-Moslem Europeans ought to have the same share in the management of a Moslem University we see no reason why a poor community like the Mussalmans should tax itself doubly, and while foregoing the educational facilities provided by the State out of funds to which Mussalmans have also contributed, should found a University of its own with a capital of more than a crore to begin with for the education of no more than a thousand students.

The Constitution Committee met at Lucknow at the invitation of the Honourable the Raja Sahib of Mahmudahad, and threshed out the principles and the details of the Regulations on the three days, the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of June, working about eight hours daily. For this time of the year a surprisingly large number of members had responded to the invitation of the President and members were present from far-off Bombay and Calcutta, Peshawar, and Nagpur. We are not at liberty to say very much about the meetings before the Regulations are published for the criticism of the Community, but this much can be said that changes have been made therein which will entirely satisfy Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk and those who think with him. We may also add that those responsible for drafting them did not persist in retaining what appeared to the Nawab Sahib as defects, inasmuch as they tended to make the teaching staff of the University irresponsible to the representatives of the Community and independent of their control. We reserve criticism of some Regulations relating to residential discipline; but we may frankly confess that some of our misgivings in that connection are not shared by the majority of the Constitution Committee.

Apart from the relations of the teaching staff and the representatives of the Community, the one contentious and, to our mind, far the most important matter was the general scheme of studies and examinations, and we hope we betray no confidence in anticipating the publication of the Regulations by giving the outline of the general plan of studies adopted by the Committee. For two years after matriculation the teaching in the Moslem University will not differ much from that in vogue at present in Indian Universities, namely, instruction in a variety of subjects in a class room, which in England is confined only to schools. At the end of these two years there would be an examination, very much like the present Intermediate, but intended to be about 25 per cent. stiffer than a similar examination in existing Universities. After that there would be a bifurcation unknown in India but quite familiar to students of Oxford and Cambridge. Those desiring to acquire information on a fairly large number of subjects will study for another two years for the Ordinary Degree in which candidates would take four subjects, one of which shall be English Language, and another English Literature or an Oriental and Classical or a Modern European Language. Those desiring to make researches or wishing to acquire elementary knowledge of the methods of research; and generally those who wish to know a few cognate subjects well rather than a little of several subjects, would study for the Honours Degree in one of several Schools, like English Literature, History, Philosophy or Mathematics. This course would be midway between the Indian and the Oxford or Cambridge B.A., and something like the Indian M.A. What would distinguish it from the Indian plan of study would be the system of lecturing which would be on the model of the English Universities and not that of English Public Schools which is followed in Indian Universities. There would be University lectures dictated by University Professors and Lecturers, supplemented by the individual guidance and supervision of College Tutors teaching individual undergraduates or small batches of undergraduates one or two hours a week. A model course of studies in the School of History was drawn up at the suggestion of the Committee by a Sub-Committee of Oxford and Cambridge graduates attending the meeting. The suggestions of the Sub-Committee were unanimously adopted by the Constitution Committee, and it is hoped that no amount of specious reasoning about increased expenditure would induce the Committee hereafter to go back upon its unanimous resolution, that if the Muhammedan University is to be an improvement upon existing Indian Universities, it should provide a better system of instruction and a higher course of studies than has yet been attempted in India. It is only by keeping a margin of at least 25 per cent between its own Degrees and those of Government Universities rather than by slavishly following the standards of the latter that the Moslem University would best ward off the charge that it is being established in order to manufacture cheaper and more numerous B.A.'s.

We congratulate the Committee on the result of its labours, and we hope the Regulations as modified at Lucknow would be published not later than a fortnight so that the community may have the amplest opportunity of judging them before they are presented to the Government as the necessary accompaniments of the Acts and the Statutes. It is needless to say that the hospitality of the Hon. Raja Sir Ali Muhammad Khan, K.C.S.I., who entertained all the members of the Committee as his guests during their stay at Lucknow, was lavish in the extreme. But no less gratitude can be expressed to him for the sagacious and kind manner in which he presided throughout the long discussions, allowing full freedom to all to explain their varying points of view and putting in a word of suggestion himself only when it was necessary to drive the discussion into a more fruitful channel. The discussion was animated throughout, but no effort was made to make long and mostly irrelevant speeches, and as each member could speak more than once, if necessary, different points of criticism were caught up and replied to then and there. It is only in this way that a draft comprising 57 chapters and covering 70 pages could be thoroughly dealt with by a Committee of which some 30 members attended the meetings. But if credit is due to the Committee and its President, no less is due to its Secretary whose exertions during the past few months could not but have been great. It is a pleasure to know that he was relieved of much mechanical labour by some undergraduates of the College, and we think he could have received assistance from willing workers among his own Indian colleagues at Aligarh whose association would have been alike beneficial to him, to them, and to the Moslem community.

All that now remains to be done is to collect what little is yet required to make up, in cash or capitalized value of annual grants, the minimum of 35 lakhs, and to have the University Bill introduced in the Simla session. We trust the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler would now hand over the draft Constitution to the Legislative Department for drafting the Moslem University Bill, so that when other things are ready time may not be wasted in the necessary but mechanical processes of drafting. We can find no excuse for such ~~stagnation~~ as understand these things and have yet withheld ~~proposals~~ after the promise of a donation. But all do not understand, and an impression, which is as erroneous as it is unfortunate, prevails that the Government is delaying the establishment of the promised University. We trust an authoritative pronouncement declaring that the Constitution drafted by the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad's Committee is acceptable to Government and a Bill framed on those lines will be introduced in the Simla session if the necessary funds are there, would dispel all harmful rumours and put fresh heart into the community. This is not too much to ask; but we cannot say that even this would have been necessary if the workers had displayed the energy and the donors had matched with performance the promise of the first few months of last year.

من از بیگانگان هرگز نه نالم *
که بر من آنچه کرد آن آشنا کرد

(I bewail not of the oppression of others, for all that was done to me came from that friend himself.)

Persia.

News of the Week.

A telegram from Teheran received in St Petersburg says, that the Government troops have occupied Kermanshah. No fighting took place. Salar-Eddaulah fled to an unknown destination.

Official Turkish advices explain the conflict on the Turko-Persian frontier reported on the 30th May in the following manner:—The Turkish detachment was sent against the brigands who were raiding Turkish territory. It is possible that the detachment in the heat of conflict entered Persian territory, but, in any case, the detachment will be recalled and there is no intention to occupy Kotour.

Reuter wires from Vienna:—Count Hugo Logothetti has been appointed Minister to Persia.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "STANDARD.")

M. Randre, formerly French Minister at Copenhagen and afterwards Ambassador to Italy and Japan, has been selected as president of the Société d'Etudes for the proposed Transpersian Railway. In addition to Sir William Garstin, the British vice-president (states Reuter's Agency), there will be a Russian vice-president, who has not yet been nominated.

The French banks participating are the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas, the Crédit Lyonnais, the Société Générale, the Comptoir National, the Banque de l'Union Parisienne and Count d'Arnaux representing a group of financiers.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, May 12.

Although the situation at Kerman is still unsettled, the Consul apprehends no danger whatever to British subjects.

Discord is said to prevail among Yezem's Armenian followers, as the Dashnaksutian Society withholds all support from the Government since the dissolution of the Mejliss. The elections do not appear to approach appreciably nearer. The Regent has postponed departure till May 28th, but still seems determined to go.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Lord Lamington, who stayed at Teheran from Monday to Friday of last week and was extensively entertained by the Persian Government, was to leave Enzeli yesterday evening for Europe.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, May 16.

Amir Azam, Governor of Kerman, being unable to control the situation, has taken bast in the British Consulate.

Owing to the Afghan incursion near Yazdun there is a possibility that a British arbitrator will be, according to precedent, nominated to make an award regarding the frontier, which in this neighbourhood is still undetermined.

Saturday's Aftab will publish an official communiqué declaring that the delay in the proclamation of elections is due to the desire of the Government that the elections shall take place in "full security." Nevertheless, the Government stands by the Constitution and exists only as a "National" Government. The Government desires liberty for the Press, but cannot permit "shocking" political articles.

The first announcement appears to relegate the elections to the neighbourhood of the Greek Kalends; the second happily expresses the attitude of the censor in all countries.

Morocco.

News of the Week.

London, May 30.

General Lyautey has sent a despatch in which he states that hundreds of Berbers on the evening of the 28th May entered Fez to the east, but receiving no support from those in the town retired at midnight. The French troops at dawn attacked the enemy. Reinforcements are expected from Nequinez. The Sultan is endeavouring to help General Lyautey in the measures to establish order and divide the tribes.

It appears that the French lost heavily in the attack by the Berbers on the town of Fez on the night of the 25th May. A telegram which the wireless station at Fez refused was brought to Tangier by a cruiser. It says that the French lost 42 killed and 75 wounded.

London, May 31.

Reuter wires from Paris —The newspapers agree that the situation at Fez is grave. The Fez correspondent of the Mahr telegraphs that the danger is growing daily and that at least ten additional battalions will be required before the French can master the situation. Holy war is being preached everywhere and the unrest is general.

General Lyautey reports that a column left Fez at dawn on the 1st instant to attack a very large body of the enemy in the hills, six miles to the north-east of Fez. They bombarded the enemy's position, the enemy fleeing in a mob to the mountains, leaving many dead. The French losses were nine killed and twenty-eight wounded.

The English Non-Commissioned Officer, Redman, Instructor to the Sultan's troops, was killed while gallantly leading the attack. A special funeral service was held for Redman at Fez. General Bonillaud said he deeply regretted Redman's loss. He eulogised his courage and said he was loved by his superiors and his comrades alike. His death in the French ranks was a fresh bond in the Anglo-French Union. General Lyautey declared that Redman died nobly in a noble cause. The British Consul expressed his thanks and his appreciation of the speeches.

General Lyautey owing to the friendliness of the inhabitants of Fez has remitted the war contribution levied on the town. The action has caused intense satisfaction.

It is reported that the Franco-Spanish Agreement on the subject of Morocco is on the point of settlement. The news is greeted with much satisfaction.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, May 9.

All the best informed people here seem to realise the seriousness of the trouble which is impending. With the hearty goodwill of their Kaid the great southern tribes have unanimously resolved to pay no tribute to the Sherrefian Treasury under foreign dictation. The Sultan being absolutely powerless to collect taxes, this will inevitably mean that he will need the assistance of French troops on a very large scale to bring Marrakesh and the Sus Provinces into line.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 10.

Reports from Fez state that the harka which scattered before the advance of Lieutenant-Colonel Giraudon's column towards the east has again collected and appears to be meditating an attack. The Zaians are reported to have gathered at Ain-el-Orma, half way between Mequinez and Suk-el-Arba, in the Zemmur country, on the main road to Fez, where they bar the way of the military convoys. A battalion has been sent to reinforce the troops at Mequinez and disperse the rebels.

It appears that the reported pillaging of a farm belonging to a German firm by Sherrefian troops under French officers is based upon the fact that some of the Arbana deserters had taken refuge in the farm and the Sherrefian troops were compelled to surround it before they could arrest the mutineers. Among the workmen on the farm who attempted to defend the deserters were a certain number of German protégés. The incident has been the subject of conversations between the French and German representatives at Tangier, but no diplomatic protest has been made.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 10.

News from French sources in Fez and other centres points to widespread unrest among the Moroccan tribes, of which the Zemmurs, Zaers and Beni Warain appear to be the most active. The rebel harka which was threatening the capital has been driven back by a French force under General Giraudon. The enemy, who numbered about 600, are believed to have suffered heavy loss, but as they were not dispersed it will be necessary to force a fresh engagement.

According to statements attributed to General Lyautey, the French do not propose until the autumn to do more than police the Taurirt region, since heat and disease would work havoc among the troops. It is inferred that as the ultimate object of the French is to occupy Taza and to effect a junction between their forces east and west of Fez, the next few months will be passed in preparing the ground by reorganizing the finances and the administration.

In order to bring up to strength the French Military Mission, which has been decimated by the recent massacre at Fez, 12 officers of all arms and one Algerian native officer have been seconded for service with the Sherrefian army.

Berlin, May 10.

According to the Berlin Lokalanzeiger, the German Ambassador in Paris has, upon the instructions of his Government, raised officially the question of the alleged depredations committed on German farms in Morocco by native police under the command of French officers. The matter was mentioned in your Paris correspondence yesterday.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 12.

General Lyautey, Resident-General of Morocco reached Mers-el-Kebir yesterday and had a long conference with M. Varnier, the High Commissioner on the Algerian frontier, and General Alix, commanding the frontier troops. He left last night for Tangier.

A Fez telegram, dated 9th May states that the harka of the Innauen tribes reformed after the return of the Giraudon column to Fez. The tribes to the north of the capital, notably the Sheraga, appeared to be calming down. It is announced from Casablanca that General Dalbier is preparing to start with five battalions in order to disperse a harka of the Zammur which has gathered under the command of Haka Hamou, a well-known caid of the Zaians.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Madrid, May 14.

Fighting of some severity took place in the Riff yesterday between the Spanish troops and the Moors. The enemy for some days had been observed crossing the Kert, and early yesterday morning were discovered in considerable numbers at Tauriat, Hamet and Ulad Ganem and the intervening heights, their apparent intention being to cross the valley of the Maxin and attack the Spanish convoys. The Spanish forces moved out to dislodge them. The fighting lasted all day, the Moors being finally dispersed with losses which are believed to have been heavy. The Spanish losses are returned as one officer and seven men killed and four officers and 60 men wounded.

A glance at the map proves the Moorish enterprise to have been remarkable for several of the positions they occupied are well within the Spanish lines.

Madrid, May 16.

In the course of further operations against the Moors undertaken yesterday by the Spanish troops in the Riff, the chief, El Mizian, was killed. The death of this fanatic, who although not a military leader, was regarded as the soul of the harka, has caused intense satisfaction in Madrid. The Spanish losses are officially returned as two officers and 11 men killed, five officers and 42 men wounded.

Paris, May 16.

General Lyautey, the new Resident-General in Morocco, who has been very cordially received by the population and garrison on his arrival at Casablanca, will leave to-morrow for Rabat, where he will remain till his departure on Sunday for Fez, which he expects to reach on the 24th. He has instructed Colonel Giraudon to join him on Saturday at Rabat in order personally to direct any military operations which may be necessary en route.

(FROM THE "NEWCASTLE DAILY CHRONICLE")

The condition of things in Morocco continues to give rise to considerable anxiety. There is, indeed, a haunting suspicion in Paris that the Government is concealing something. Why, for example, should the Sultan hurry off to Rabat? That the journey would be attended by serious risks is shown by the fact that a powerful military escort, commanded by General Moinier himself, is deemed necessary for Mulay Hafid's protection. This escort, however, would necessarily consist of troops drawn from the garrison at Fez, and it is pointed out that the Moroccan capital in its disturbed state cannot spare a single man loyal to the Sultan and the French. M. Poincaré and the Government are strongly urged to keep M. Regnaud at his post instead of immediately recalling him, and to postpone the journey to Rabat until after the arrival of General Lyautey, the only person believed to be thoroughly competent to deal with the situation. The apprehension is that by engaging in some false step disastrous consequences might follow to the prestige of the French already somewhat menaced by recent events at Fez Marching to the Unknown.

By HARRY DE WINDT.

Colomb-Bechar, S.-W. Algeria, April 30.

THE unrest and dissatisfaction among the Moors, which has just culminated in a general massacre of Europeans in Fez, was not confined to the capital and its surrounding districts. For its effects have been felt not only throughout Morocco, but even here—the most remote French outpost in Algeria, at the terminus of the narrow-gauge railway which connects it with the sea, 500 miles due north, at Oran. Colomb Bechar is but seven years old—a glary, shadeless little town of the usual Franco-Saharan type, consisting of a strongly-fortified "gare," large barracks, and half a dozen desolate, sun-baked streets adorned with double rows of leafless sticks and called "boulevards." There are few shops, but many "cafés," or rather, "buvettes," where French and native soldiers sit, in the cool of sunset, at little zinc tables, and smoke cigarettes and drink "absinthe," while their officers assemble for dinner at a newly-built but truly pestiferous hotel, which also serves as their mess.

But we are here practically in the Great Sahara Desert. Due south of us a dreary sea of perilous plains and sand dunes stretches away to Timbuctoo, a two months' journey, while only three miles westward the frontier, and south eastern extremity, of Morocco is defined by a range of low rugged hills. A day's march beyond them lies Bou-Denib, another new military post in the protectorate, which only last June was attacked by the Moors, who were only defeated after a long and fierce engagement, in which both sides lost heavily. More than half the French were killed, for they were fighting an immeasurably superior force, while, the telegraph wires having been cut, it was impossible to obtain reinforcements until too late from Colomb-Bechar.

Forty miles west of Bou-Denib is the vast and fertile Tafilet province, one of the largest in the country, not only famous for its delicious dates, but for its fanatical and warlike tribes, which successive Sultans of Morocco have, for ages past, vainly tried to bring into submission. No European has ever visited their jealously-guarded stronghold, for no white man could ever return.

It is estimated that the Tafilet district alone can put 60,000 fighting men, armed with modern weapons, in the field, and it is from these people, who (the authorities here have ascertained) have been falsely informed that the French have been driven out of Fez, that trouble is now expected, the critical nature of the situation arising from the fact that every town, for the latter half of the distance from here to Oran, is now practically defenceless, nearly all the troops having been sent to the scene of imminent conflict across the frontier. All this has happened within the past week.

Three days ago Colomb-Bechar, in its usual condition of peaceful stagnation, was garrisoned by about 400 men of the Foreign Legion Spahis and Senegalese Tirailleurs. Last night, while we were at dinner, a telegram sent every officer rushing to his quarters to prepare for instant departure, and the place is now guarded solely by a score of black soldiers and their sergeant. And the same thing has occurred at every town down the line halfway to Oran, with the solitary exception of Beni-Ouni, thirty miles distant, which is still fully garrisoned, for it is in a mining district, and consequently of commercial importance.

Nor are towns north of it, though closely skirting the frontier, likely to be attacked, but it is certainly tempting Providence to leave Colomb-Bechar, the terminus of an important railway, practically at the mercy of thousands of wild and fanatical Moors only sixty miles away, who might at any moment appear on the scene, destroy the line and telegraph, and kill every soul in the place. Every Moroccan town and village along the border is now seething with the spirit of revolt, and an instance of this was shown only last week, when M. Lyautey, the Governor-General of Algeria, arrived here on an official visit, during which one of his escort was murdered and mutilated, in broad daylight, within a mile of the hotel, presumably by some Moorish raider, convinced, like the Tafilet people, of the downfall of the French and to show his contempt for their authority.

I witnessed the departure of the troops at daybreak this morning on their first stage to Bou-Denib, and never saw a swifter, tougher-looking lot than those tanned and wiry Legionnaires and Spahis, for this rough desert life makes men of even weaklings. But, alas! they numbered under four hundred, and the bi-weekly train here will only land six hundred more to complete the expeditionary force, which will thus, as usual, be pitted against overwhelming hordes of well-armed Moors.

"But what can we do?" said a captain of Spahis, when I ventured to suggest that, under the circumstances, 1,000 men seemed utterly inadequate. "We have no available men in Algeria. Morocco has already drained us and the Tripoli frontier has to be guarded." And I wondered as I watched the little column fade away in the grey dawn whether any of those brave men would ever see their beloved France again, for this, in view of their apparently hopeless task, seems highly improbable.

Disaster appeared a foregone conclusion when I thought of that grim, serried army of sixty thousand Moors calmly awaiting this mere handful of humanity in their mountainous stronghold, sixty miles away. And strolling homewards to the hotel, I recalled the remark made by a distinguished staff officer whom I recently met at head-quarters in Algiers.

"How long," I asked him, "will it take you to pacify the whole of Morocco?"

"The Chaouia province," was the reply, "has taken us nearly two years to subdue, and there are thirty more of the same size and strength, so you yourself can calculate." And I was well able to do so—at Colomb-Bechar.—The Daily News.

French Treatment of The Sultan.

The Depêche Coloniale, the organ of the French Colonial group, publishes a highly noteworthy article on the unrest in Morocco, in which it disposes of the current fables concerning the origin of recent events and utters a warning against continuing the former "forward" policy. There is not, it says, a word of truth in the reports about the "neurasthenic" state of Mulay Hafid's health, nor in the stories about his licker character. "The Europeans who had the opportunity of knowing him at Marrakesh and have met him recently at Fez carried away with them an impression which directly contradicts this rather disparaging description. They found him to be an earnest man, acting with deliberation, and but little inclined to yield to fantastic impulses." It is, in fact, the treatment meted out to Mulay Hafid by the French, as if he were a mere puppet, that has led both to his revolt and to the unrest among the tribes. "For the last twelve months," says the journal, "we have been acting as if there had been no longer any Sultan, as if we could do without him, and we treated him like a shadow. His troops were being organised, his cadis were appointed and dismissed, without his being asked any opinion. No wonder that his authority, which was thus being undermined by our own hands, could no longer prevail against the rebellious elements. No wonder also that he himself should feel but a very doubtful pleasure in exercising his sovereignty, which only subsists in name, and only knows its burdens, moral responsibilities and dangers, and no advantages. In this he has the more ground to complain as the actual position does not at all correspond with the prospects which we showed him when he made common cause with us. In those days we spoke of co-operation, of a union in which we should be, not masters bent upon substituting our authority for his, but leaders and advisers concerned with the preservation of his dignity and careful not to infringe his lawful prerogatives. He has kept his part of the bargain and discharged his obligations, but we have robbed him bit by bit of his authority and his prestige. Is that the sort of co-operation that was promised? Is it to be wondered at that he feels disappointed and tired of his position?"—Manchester Guardian.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND.

	Rs.	A.	P.
Through Mohamed Salih Sahib, Bangalore—
K. K. ...	2	8	0
Ladies of the A. M. N. ...	1	5	0
Through Mohamed Azeem Sahib—
M. Yusuf Sahib, Rangoon ...	2	0	0
M. Ismail Sahib ...	2	0	0
Shah Ziaullah Sahib, Rangoon ...	1	0	0
Hafiz Nazir Ahmed Sahib Rangoon ...	1	0	0
M. Kabir Ahmed Sahib ...	1	0	0
Mohamed Azeem Sahib ...	3	0	0
Munshi Mohamed Sahib, Poona ...	1	4	0
Mohamed Ajar (on behalf of a bridegroom) Nurhat ...	3	0	0
M. B. Ali, Esq., Superintendent, Post Offices, Sylhet ...	19	0	0
Ali Uddin, Hashim Esq., Medical Officer, Kherua ...	10	0	0
Abdul Aziz Khan Sahib, Bhagalpur ...	3	0	0
Amount received during the week ...	50	1	0
Amount previously acknowledged ...	16,969	11	0
TOTAL ...	17,019	12	0

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Signor Giolitti, in an interview with a representative of the Daily Chronicle, said he did not think that the war would last much longer. "Unless Turkey submits soon," he said, "Italy will strike harder than she has yet done."

Reuter wired from Rome—Signor Giolitti has introduced a Bill authorising the Government to create a Ministry of Colonies.

Reuter wired from Athens on 1st instant:—Owing to the determination of the Cretan Deputies to take their seats at the opening of the Chamber to-day, thus disregarding the protests of the Powers and the counsels of the Greek Government, strong cordons of troops with rifles tearfully barred their progress. Thereupon the Cretan Deputies sent a deputation to parley with the Premier. Enormous crowds were present. When the excitement had subsided some troops were withdrawn. The Chamber adjourned till 14th October.

Reuter wired from Berlin on the 2nd June.—The Deutsche Orientkorrespondenz learns from Constantinople that Turkey has informed Great Britain of her decision of abandoning Koweit as the terminal of the Baghdad Railway and of substituting a place on the Gulf of Khor Abdullah.

Negotiations in London regarding the Baghdad Railway are proceeding satisfactorily. The report published on the 2nd June of the Turkish abandonment of Koweit as terminus is denied.

Reuter wired from Constantinople on the 4th June.—A fire broke out in Stambul at ten o'clock yesterday morning and was still burning at eight last night. The flames swept a lane three-quarters of a mile long from the old Seraglio to the Agasophia Mosque, which escaped with damage. Several other mosques were badly damaged.

Reuter wired from Constantinople.—Over a thousand houses, four mosques and ten schools have been burned in Stambul. 15,000 are homeless and several have perished in the flames. The fire originated in a house which was under construction. A fire occurred in Pera, later, and twenty houses were destroyed. High wind and scarcity of water assisted the conflagrations.

On the occasion of the last Id-ul-Zuha, in December, the Amir in a long speech in Durbar, induced his officials and peoples to collect subscriptions in aid of the Turkish and Arab soldiers in Tripoli, and gave Rs. 20,000 from his private purse. The Amir's appeal appears to have met with a general response in Afghanistan, and subscriptions have been, and are being, collected systematically. From a copy of the Serajul Akhbar, Kabul, just received in India, it appears that up to the end of April Rs. 1,80,000 (Kabul coin), equal to £6,000, had been collected.

The Aden correspondent of the Times of India, writing on 31st May, states that the Italian blockade of Hodeida, Saliff and the adjacent Turkish ports continues, and trade between Aden and these places is still paralysed. According to bazaar gossip an Italian war-ship has again appeared off Shaikh Said but details are lacking.

Saliff was lately bombarded by an Italian cruiser. It lies about 34 miles north of Hodeida and some 200 miles away from Aden immediately opposite the eastern side of the island of Cameron. It has no harbour but is protected in some measure by a tongue of land known as Ras Isa and there is sufficient depth of water to allow ships of all dimensions safe anchorage. Saliff has been improved during the past decade or so. A jetty has been constructed there of about 1,000 feet in length, the latter two hundred feet of which is built of iron terminating in a T head and two or three lines of rails have been laid along the jetty communicating with different depôts. The importance of Saliff is evidently due to the fact that it has large salt works and carries on very brisk trade in shipping salt to Calcutta and other places in the East.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM A SPECIAL "MORNING POST" CORRESPONDENT.)

Zamora, May 10.

On 3rd May an Italian regiment left Bukmesh with the object of capturing a large caravan coming from the frontier, but was engaged by the Turco-Arabs and compelled, after a fight lasting two hours, to retire to its trenches. The Italians left 31 men dead on the battlefield and the Turco-Arabs had 20 men killed and 20 wounded. The guns of the fleet succeeded in stopping the Turkish pursuit.

On 5th May the Italians attacked the Turkish forces outside Homs, but were obliged to retire with the loss of 23 men, including two officers.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Temps quotes a passage from the latest proclamation scattered among the Arabs in Tripoli by the Italian aeroplanes, announcing the "conquest" of Lebda and Rhodes. "Arabs!" it says, "why do you continue to stay with the Turks, who are poisoning you with bad food? These nauseous and revolting provisions are the cause of the diseases, infections and epidemics from which so many of you are dying. Do you not see that God, who gives kingdom to those whom He loves and takes them away from those whom He dislikes, is on the side of the great Italian power, and helps it by leaving the door of conquest widely open? When will you understand?"

A "high Austrian naval officer" (ex-Admiral Chiari) writes in the Vienna Zeit saying that General Mahmud Shevket Pasha, the Turkish Minister of War, has invited all the military attachés in Constantinople to inspect the damage caused by the Italian bombardment to the forts at the mouth of the Dardanelles. He wants to show that the Italian naval gun practice is very faulty, and that the action of the navy was a complete fiasco. The number of shells fired was 310, and as each cost £90, the total amount spent in ammunition was nearly £30,000, while the damage caused consisted only in one roof burned and one horse killed. The writer himself is of the opinion that the Italian navy has lost fully 20 per cent. in fighting value since the beginning of the war.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, May 8.

The activity of the Bulgarian Revolutionary Committee is being amply demonstrated by the determined attempts of the increasing number of bands to cross the frontier into Macedonia. Most elaborate precautions have been taken by the Turks to prevent invasion. The frontier guards have been considerably augmented, ambushes have been laid in the passes, and frequent patrols survey the line between the blockhouses. Encounters between invading bands and Turkish patrols are of daily occurrence. Palanka seems to be the favourite point of invasion, but is closely followed in importance by the Djumabala district.

Throughout Macedonia the efforts of the authorities to stamp out bands are meeting with more than their customary success. The inauguration of flying companies of gendarmes charged with the active pursuit of komsadjis has largely contributed to this result. Some 3,500 gendarmes are now engaged in this special work. Encounters with bands are frequent, but the Bulgars usually succeed in making their escape with the loss of one or two killed.

On his return to Salonika to-day to reoccupy the post of Vali, Hussein Kiazim Bey met with an unparalleled reception. He arrived at Salonika to find the town en fete. The streets from the station to the Konak were packed with a cheering populace, the demonstration reflecting the esteem in which he is held by all sections of the inhabitants.

Athens, May 13.

Steamships arriving at the Piræus from the Aegean islands report that the Italians have disembarked large quantities of war material at Rhodes, together with provisions, tents, apparatus for wireless telegraphy and telephones. Preparations have been made for dredging the harbour, repairing fortifications, and laying tramway lines, and everything seems to indicate that a prolonged occupation is intended. The number of Turkish prisoners, including the Governor, who attempted to escape in disguise, is stated to be 160. Eighty more were captured on board the Hadjî Dami, a steamer arriving from Smyrna, and were conveyed to Astropalia. Three aeroplanes are already surveying the Turkish positions in the mountains. Bombs were dropped on the Turkish provision depôts, which were abandoned, and the Italians seized the stores, conveying them to the town on mules. The Turks intrenched in the mountains are stated to number 1,300.

At Samos the Turkish garrison, stated to number 800, has abandoned the town and has intrenched the heights in the direction of Tigani. The Christian population, fearing that the Turks would oppose the Italian landing and that a bombardment would follow, informed the military authorities that upon the slightest show of resistance they would attack the troops. As at Rhodes, the population is prepared to welcome the Italians.

A Cretan Moulem at Rhodes was tried by court-martial and shot for firing from a house on the troops, and another was shot by a patrol. The Turks appear to have brought a contingent of irregulars, numbering some hundreds, from Crete.

Sofia, May 12

Professors Georgoff and Miletich, who have recently returned from their visit to the European capitals, gave an account of their mission yesterday to a specially summoned meeting of delegates representing Macedonian charitable organizations throughout Bulgaria. The meeting resolved to hold mass meetings in all the towns of Bulgaria in favour of the autonomy of Macedonia. In accordance with this decision a large and imposing meeting took place here this morning, with M. Grozeff, President of the Chamber of Commerce, in the chair. After patriotic speeches by Professor Tzoneff and M. Grigor Vasilieff, describing the intolerable situation of the Bulgarians in Macedonia owing to their systematic persecution by the Young Turks, a resolution was adopted urging the Bulgarian Government by all the means at its disposal to work for the enforcement of Article 23 of the Berlin Treaty providing for autonomy for Macedonia.

Constantinople, May 12.

Exaggerated reports of disturbances on a large scale in Northern Albania have caused no little anxiety even in high official circles during the last few days. This anxiety, however, has been largely dispelled by telegrams from the local authorities indicating that the recent collisions between Moslems and Albanian hillmen on the one hand and gendarmes or troops on the other in the Ipek, Puka and Lower Dibra districts were mere sporadic manifestations of lawlessness rather than warnings of coming insurrection. The situation in Albania must remain somewhat strained till the reforms proposed by Hadji Adil Bey's commission are put into execution, but it cannot be said to be worse than at any other period during the last six months.

Sofia, May 15

The Albanians at Djakova have dispersed, while those at Istok remain massed in the mountains, but the present action of the authorities is limited to attempts to persuade them to return to their homes. As a matter of precaution the pass of Katchanik has been occupied by troops: two battalions guard the route to Ferizovich and three await orders at Mitrovitza.

The Times was requested by the Turkish Embassy to publish the following short but general statement of events which have taken place up to now in different Albanian localities —

"On 23rd April some individuals from Ipek attacked the workmen who were constructing the causeway at Mahir Stock. A similar aggression took place against the workers and foremen engaged for the erection of the Governor's residence, the school and a guard-post. The encounter lasted all day, but, thanks to the intervention of the Mutassarif, order was restored. Twenty-five of the aggressors were killed; the troops suffered no loss. By way of precaution, a battalion and half a company of mitrailleuse were summoned to Ipek from Djakova. Four battalions were also ordered from other localities.

"The same day the gendarmes posts at Ganisizze, Meirdina, and Taradj were assailed by brigands from Zadrina. The latter had to take to flight after four hours' exchange of firing. The same day, again, three bandits, at ten minutes' distance from Gossina, surprised two officers and a private on their way to the Varnatchatik Springs and robbed them of their horses. The military detachment sent in pursuit was attacked by the populace, troops were then sent and had to bombard Koules for three hours. They finally entered the town, where peace was at once restored. Five soldiers and one gendarme were killed, two soldiers and one gendarme wounded. The casualties on the insurgents' side were 15 killed and wounded.

"All reports to the effect that the troops had hundreds killed are, accordingly, untrue. Likewise are those reports alleging that the Albanians had made certain demands. A part only of the populations from the villages of Kresnik, Bogotch and Has, in Djakova, assembled on 26th April round the Governor's residence and claimed with threats the Government's written pledge to distribute arms to them. Three days have since elapsed without the slightest incident occurring."

(FROM THE "EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 15.

A Cabinet Council was held to-day to discuss the concentration of Russian troops which continues at Odessa and Sebastopol.

It is reported that calm has been restored at Diakovo and Ipek in Albania, except in isolated cases, and that the court-martials are dealing satisfactorily with the rebels.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Times publishes the following information from Constantinople:—"It is stated that the Porte is disquieted by reports concerning Russian military movements. The Porte has been advised from Sinope, on the Black Sea coast of Asia Minor, that the Russian navy is cruising in the night with lights extinguished along the coast. It is said that the Minister for Foreign Affairs has asked M. de Giers, the new Ambassador, for explanations, and the latter has replied that it is simply a matter of some torpedo-boats executing manoeuvres and that they have now returned to Kertch.

"The diplomatic reception on Monday was interrupted by a special meeting of the Cabinet. Asmi Bey, the Foreign Minister, had only received two or three Ambassadors, including M. de Giers, with whom he had a long conversation on the above subject. The reasons for the urgent summoning of the Cabinet are unknown. It is rumoured that the Cabinet met in order to deliberate on the new démarche which M. de Giers had just made in connection with the opening of the Dardanelles. It is also stated that the Council was engaged on the subject of the Russian concentrations and the movements of the Russian navy in the Black Sea, and with the situation in Albania, which causes the Government considerable uneasiness."

(THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, April 30.

Developing the idea that Turkey is making use of her absolute right of defence and that the Powers which regard themselves as injured in their commercial interests by the Turkish defensive measures should address themselves to the Power which provoked those measures by its aggression, the Turkish Press unanimously approves the reply of the Sublime Porte to the Russian Note on the re-opening of the Dardanelles to the mercantile marine.

The despatch of this Note, followed by the speech of M. Sazonoff in the Duma, several passages of which have caused much displeasure, has given rise in Ottoman political circles to anti-Russian feelings, such as have not been displayed since the revolution of 1908. These feelings find expression in leading articles of a somewhat violent character.

The Tanin, Sabah and Yeni Gazette are disturbed and irritated by the announcement of an entente with Italy in regard to the Balkan Peninsula and resent the advice given to the Turkish Government to show solicitude for the Christians in Macedonia.

In regard to the announced intention to renew the attempt at mediation between the belligerents, the ex-Minister Ismail Hakki Bey Babanzade says, in the Tanin, that the intention is praiseworthy, but he asks if, after the speech of M. Sazonoff, one can expect, on the part of Russia, that impartiality which is necessary for a mediator.

It is very characteristic of the actual state of Ottoman opinion that this current of feeling, instead of resulting in a turn towards Germany, has provoked a recrudescence of sympathy for England, even in certain journals which have for a long time been notoriously hostile—such, for example, as the Jeune Turc, which insists upon the cold brevity of the speech in regard to England, and the ingratuity in relation to the benefits derived by Russia from German friendship.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 12.

Hahit Bey, Deputy for Menteshch, has been elected head of the Parliamentary party of the Committee of Union and Progress. Seid Bey, of Smyrna, M. Haladjian, and M. Hashim, of Constantinople, and Mehmed Pasha, of Damascus, have been elected vice-presidents. M. Ahmed Nessim, of Constantinople, Djanbelat Bey, of Ismid, secretaries, M. Emmanuelides, of Smyrna, treasurer; and Rahmi Bey, of Salonika, and Hadji Mustafa, of Angora, whips.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Athens correspondent of the Corriere della Sera announces (says Reuter's Rome correspondent) that hundreds of Italians, whose expulsion from Smyrna has been ordered, assembled yesterday in front of the German consulate there and asked for means to take them back to Italy. It is not known whether or not the Turkish decree of expulsion applies to the women and children also, but the Italians are panic-stricken in consequence of the arrest of 90 of their number, and women and children are being hurriedly got away. Up to the present about 20 refugees have arrived at the Piræus.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 12.

The Tanin, commenting on the rumours of Baron Marschall von Bieberstein's probable appointment to the German Embassy in London, expresses the hope that in any negotiations which Baron Marschall may conduct with the British Government on questions affecting Turkish interest Turkey may be consulted, and that others may not reap the fruits of the efforts recently made to bring about a better understanding between England and Turkey.

The journal further expresses the conviction that Baron Marschall's habitual consideration for Turkish interests affords a guarantee that in negotiations on questions connected with the Bagdad-Basra section of the Bagdad Railway the Turkish Government will not be left out of account, as were the Government of Morocco and Persia during the negotiations effecting those countries.

The Balkan Committee.

The Constantinople Tanin prints a letter from the Balkan Committee, dated 24th April, in which the suggestion is made to entrust the administration of Macedonia and Albania for a period of at least one year to two commissions enjoying full powers and composed partly of Turkish officials who have never occupied any responsible post in the Macedonian or Albanian vilayets, and partly of British and French members. The letter is followed by a note from Hussein Kiazim Bey, formerly Governor of Salonika, who comments upon the suggestion as follows:—

"In view of the new movements of the bands in Macedonia, the above plan deserves attention, for the Balkan Committee, which after the proclamation of the Constitution was favourable to us, has now turned against our present régime and has tried to alienate British public opinion from us. The régime suggested was in great vogue at the time of the Inspectorate-General of Hilmi Pasha, but its work was destroyed by its own lack of logic. As a matter of fact this régime, so far from preventing foreign intervention, prepared the way for it, so that in the end the separation of Macedonia became a matter of certainty. It was just with the object of avoiding it that the Constitution, as everybody knows, was proclaimed.

"It is true that the new régime has not yet given the full satisfaction which one might have expected, but the fault lies with the Government, which appointed, there as elsewhere, men without energy and without knowledge, who could not but make matters worse. The Macedonian disease is a chronic one, and chronic diseases are not treated by violent means. For the rest it is not the sickness but the sick who ought to be treated, and this is what is only too frequently forgotten. We are convinced that the application of the new law on the administration of the vilayets will give excellent results in Macedonia and will bring the people back to the Government. As for Albania, Hadji Adil Bey has just studied her wants and will be able to find a remedy for her ills. We do not want therefore the 'sincere and friendly' support of the members of the Committee."

The Uskub correspondent of the Vossische Zeitung predicts for the near future great activity of the revolutionary bands in Macedonia as a result of the electoral victory of the Young Turkish Committee. "As they fear that the present Government may take up with energy the work of reforms, and thus gain an influence over the Christian population, the leading members of the secret societies have come to the conclusion that something must be done to frustrate the work of conciliation in advance. The idea is to revive, with all its horrible consequences for the country, the old sanguinary war of bands, in the hope of creating the impression in Europe that the cause of the unrest is the victory of the Committee. It is a well-established fact that preparations for a revival of the activity of the bands are being feverishly pushed in the chief foreign centres of the revolutionary movement, and that a series of dynamite outrages of all kinds is being planned. The well-known Bulgarian chief Peter Anieloff has, it is reported, made his appearance in the district of Egri Palanka in order to punish certain villages who have reverted to the ecclesiastical rule of the Patriarch under the pressure of Servian hands.

"The Serbs have quite suddenly taken once more to bands, after having kept away from all agitation since the proclamation of the constitution, and even voted during the recent elections for the Committee. Two Servian Vorvodes have already been killed in a conflict with the troops, one of them being the son of a former chief Gligor, who is the hero of many Servian songs."

The correspondent further states that the authorities are keeping careful watch over the Bulgarian frontier, and are contemplating the erection of blockhouse for the permanent exclusion of bands coming from that country.—The Manchester Guardian.

Bulgarian Ambitions in Macedonia.

In spite of the semi-official denials of the political importance of the visit of a Bulgarian mission to Livadia, where the Tsar has gone for a week, the German press is inclined to regard the journey of M. Danoff and General Markoff with suspicion. In particular the Berliner Tageblatt attaches little importance to the assurances of the inspired Russian press that the visit is of a purely "ceremonial character" and points to the coincidence of the arrival of M. Kokovtseff, the Premier, M. Sazonoff, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and General Sukhomlinoff, the Minister of War, with the first announcement of the impending mission.

"We shall soon," says the Berliner Tageblatt, "feel the effect of this 'harmless ceremony' at Livadia and probably nowhere else more than in Macedonia. Bulgaria has no more ardent wish than to have the permission of Russia to make it hot for the Turks there. Officially she confines herself to claims in the interests of the Christian population in Macedonia or puts forward the old demand for the construction of a railway between Kumanovo and Kustendil, which in practice means Sofia and Salonika. Unofficially, however, she is at work busily arming bands and supporting the komitadjis, who recently selected dynamite as their favourite weapon, and conquering more than ever with the otherwise hated Greeks.

"True, nobody can say as yet that Russia has granted the required consent. M. Sazonoff, in his speech before the Duma, went even so far as to appeal to the Bulgarians and others to maintain prudence and to avoid political adventures, and spoke some energetic words in favour of preserving domestic peace in Turkey. But simultaneously he also warned Turkey against neglecting the economic and moral interests of the Christian population. In Turkey the speech was interpreted as a threat."—The Manchester Guardian.

Back from the War.

BY ALAN OSTLER.

"Express" Special Correspondent with the Turkish Forces in Tripoli.

I HAVE just returned to the civilised world after more than a year's life among the desert peoples of Northern Africa. For weeks I had been looking forward with an impatience quite beyond words to the joy of walking through busy thoroughfares and looking at shop windows, reading newspapers, and, more than all, talking in my own tongue to people whose thoughts and manners are not those of the desert—to nice, kindly, cleanly, civilised men and women.

And now that I am back again, I find that I don't like civilisation at all. At least, I find in civilised life a great many faults and drawbacks which I hardly seemed to notice before, and many of the joys which I had anticipated most keenly are often not joyful in the very least.

There is rapid travel, for instance. Again and again, riding with the slow caravans hour after hour, I have envied the happy passengers in a railway train, who could cover in twelve hours a journey that a horse cannot accomplish in as many weary, dusty days. When I landed in Glasgow the other day—I came home in a tramp steamer from the Mediterranean—I remembered those envious moments in the desert. I boarded the night train for Euston, congratulating myself on the speed and comfort with which I was to travel, and gleefully reflecting that there would be no horse to groom and feed at the journey's end, no tiresome search for fresh water, no interminable wait while an unsavoury meal was being prepared, no tent to pitch—none of the thousand and one little worries of desert travel.

Within ten minutes I was feeling most lamentably ill, watching the lights whirl past the window with sickening speed, and feeling literally stunned by the roar of the express train. The passing of another train, with the blinding stream of light and furious rattle of carriages, gave me a pang of genuine terror.

And yet, not many days ago, I was riding slowly through the zone of a furious bombardment of an Arab coast village by three Italian cruisers, and—with all modesty be it said—I felt no alarm at all.

Truthfully speaking, there is nothing very terrifying about a bombardment—especially an Italian bombardment. If you have never seen one, no doubt you form a mental impression of a world turned topsy-turvy, re-echoing with shrieks and thunderous detonations, made hideous by charred and blackened ruins and the mutilated fragments of the dead. Fugitives fly screaming from beneath a pall of sulphurous smoke, and shrapnel and fragments of shell fill the air.

This is all very well for the realism of the adventure story and the cinematograph show, but, generally speaking, lamentably overdone as regards the realism of reality. In fact, if you are the object of a bombardment, you will see very little, unless the object of the attack happens to be a town of large and fairly solid structure. An Arab village of two-storeyed mud-brick huts interspersed with palm trees could be knocked to atoms without providing anything much more spectacular than an occasional cloud of dust or shower of splintered palm-wood.

Such a village is Zouara, the most westerly of the larger coast villages of Tripoli; and save for the final destruction of houses which seemed to be already half in ruins, the periodical bombardments to which it has been subjected by the Italian warships have had about as much effect as so many pyrotechnic displays.

Therefore, approaching Zouara a few days ago on my way from the Turkish camp I honestly did not feel any particular uneasiness on learning that the town was being bombarded again. I had stayed there during two bombardments, suffering no other inconvenience than that of having to turn out of my house lest a chance shell should strike it and bring it down on my head; and after this experience of the harmless play-party which the Italians are pleased to call an attack, neither I nor the drivers of the camel-caravan with which I travelled felt any alarm at the thought of having to pass close to the village.

But civilisation is not only terrifying. To one long unaccustomed to it, it is in a great many respects highly disagreeable.

I have shivered by a brushwood fire—the desert can be bitterly cold—and thought of the joys of sitting by a fire in a cosy room in England. But now, the fire gives me a headache, and the walls of the cosy room seem to touch me on all sides. There is hardly room to move about. I wonder, by-the-by, how many people realise that their houses are merely collections of tiny islands formed by chairs, linked up by narrow pathways between tables, bookshelves, fire places, coal-scuttles, flower-stands, and I don't know how many ridiculous obstacles. Coming from a land in whose houses tables and chairs consist of the handiest clean space on the floor, this peculiarity of European life strikes me terribly.

I thought that I should greatly enjoy conversation with my own kind. I don't. Most of them talk too much. One isn't allowed to sit silently contemplative in the society of civilised people, and, consequently, instead of peacefully pursuing one's own train of thought, or enjoying that delicious state of mental inertia so dear to Orientals, one has to cudgel one's brains for topics for a conversation which in five minutes will be forgotten.

Women—well born and otherwise well-behaved women—talk freely and openly with men in the very streets, bearing themselves as though they were man's equals, and never so much as putting the corner of a handkerchief in their mouths to veil their faces.

And, finally—it is a disagreeable admission, I know—the majority of my fellow-countrymen seem singularly, and fantastically ugly beings. An Arab or a negro has a dark complexion which somehow seems to conceal faultiness of feature. He walks well, carries his head with an air, and though his mantle be in rags, his bearing is dignified.

In the streets of Glasgow on Saturday I felt in with a crowd of many hundreds who had spent the afternoon watching twenty-two men kick a leather ball about and, looking upon that crowd of pale and pimply faces, narrow shoulders, and flat chests, noting how their owners slouched and shuffled through the dirty street displaying black and broken teeth as they laughed and chattered, I forgot that these were the youth of a highly prosperous and civilised nation, and could only think of my desert folk with keen regret.

Turkey and the War.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, April 27.

The shots fired at the Dardanelles apparently did not seriously harm either of the combatants. Morally the Turks actually gained. The shots served as a precipitate which crystallised a variety of floating impressions, of suppositions and premonitions. They finally made the war real to the Turkish mind. During the last two months, indeed, the fact of the war has been steadily growing less unreal to the Turks. The lines of connection between Tripoli and the capital have multiplied. The vague outlines of the Ottoman defence have acquired colour and a strain of personality. The figure of Enver Bey is seen as in a mist, revolver in hand, leading his troops over the desert, indifferent to danger, just as in Macedonia before the Constitution, he led his soldiers first against the Bulgarian bands, and afterwards against Abdul Hamid. Then the steady recruiting of Arabs from the desert, the results already achieved in training them into regular troops, the stubbornness of their resistance to the Italians in the name of the Turkish Caliph and under the leadership of Turkish officers, have given Turks a new sense of possession in Tripoli. Emotionally speaking, the Tripolitania is now more truly a part of the Ottoman Empire than it was before the war.

Yet the war has been from the beginning much more than a trial of strength between two Mediterranean States in Northern Africa. It has been a constant reminder of a number of serious things which may happen and which may fear. It has been a perpetual challenge to those forces which press for the partition of Turkey with what seems to be its inevitable and fatal consequence—an armed conflict between the European Powers. But African distance and the habit of many months of indecisive skirmishes had made the challenge seem almost an empty menace and the war a colonial enterprise that seriously concerned no one but the Italians, the Tripolitan Arabs, and a certain number of Turkish officers. Then came the attack on Turkish ships at Beirut as a significant warning, and now the bombardment of the Dardanelles has suddenly made plain even to slow imaginations the gravity of the facts implied in the fighting at Tripoli, namely, that the Turkish State is at war, and that this war exercises a strangely disturbing influence on those arrangements on which the present European political system is based.

The sudden realisation of these facts had a bracing effect on the Turks. There was no panic in Constantinople. There was a little bravado at first, but the spirit of bravado seems now to have given place to a very sobering consciousness of the immense difficulties of the situation. The transference of hostilities to the Aegean has, in the first place, made it necessary to scrutinise very closely the attitude of the neighbouring Balkan States. All these States are officially on friendly terms with Turkey. But an exchange of official assurances and courtesies does not always represent popular feeling, and popular feeling in both Greece and Bulgaria is not friendly to the Turkish Government. The defeat of the Greek and Bulgarian popular parties in Macedonia in the recent elections has undoubtedly intensified the unfriendly feelings of the population of the northern and southern kingdoms towards the Young Turks. The bands are once more active. Not only have a number of bands, despite the precautions of the Bulgarian Government, made their way over the Bulgarian frontier into Macedonia, but Greek bands have recently entered Macedonia from the south, over the Thessalian frontier. And whereas in former days Greek and Bulgarian bands fought each other, they will now, it is asserted, co-operate against the Turkish population and the Turkish Government. Again, simultaneously with this reconciliation between Greek and Bulgarian revolutionary elements, an official rapprochement is being effected between the Governments of Greece and Bulgaria. That is to say, the friendship of either of these Governments for Turkey is something less precise than their friendship for each other. Hostilities in the Aegean, or a fresh attack on the Dardanelles might lead these two Balkan States to emphasise their community of interests to the extent of an entire reversal of their present policy of reasoned friendship for Turkey. The more impetuous spirits in Bulgaria apparently desire to precipitate such a step. According to a report received here the Macedonian Internal organisation has decided to begin an insurrectionary movement immediately, and in this, it is said, it will be assisted by an Albanian organisation which has its headquarters in Sofia. The Turkish Government would be able to cope with such a movement if its hands were left entirely free in other directions. Nor would it have any difficulty in dealing with any hostile measures on the part of Greece, if the Greek Government ventured to act alone. But if while hostilities were proceeding between Italians and Turks in the Aegean, an insurrectionary movement in Macedonia were to lead to complications with Bulgaria, which might easily be followed by complications with Greece, the situation of the Turkish Government, even if the area of disturbance could be imagined as being confined to the Balkans and the Levant, would be unenviable. The Italian naval action has made it imperatively necessary to take all these possibilities seriously into account.

Again, the Cretan question has entered on a new phase. The firm attitude of the Powers, combined with the firm attitude of the Greek Government, in the matter of the Cretan delegates to the Hellenic Parliament, seemed to provide a guarantee that serious trouble would be averted. But the attack on the Dardanelles has given fresh encouragement to the Cretan annexationists, and has led to a certain relaxation of severity in Athens. And if trouble is averted it will be owing to an increase of severity on the part of the protecting Powers.

The Powers are, by no means interested in Crete alone. The mention of the Powers at once opens up the whole broad perspective of interests, the whole complicated network of international relations, which are so profoundly affected by the transfer of hostilities to the Aegean and the Dardanelles. The Powers are concerned in the Cretan question, they are balancing their rivalries in the Balkans, and their commerce is most vitally affected by the closing of the Dardanelles. It is very natural that the Turkish Government and Turkish public opinion should be anxious to know the real attitude of the groups of Powers and of each of the Powers in the present crisis. On this subject Turkish public opinion appears already to have arrived at some interesting conclusions.

The first is that the attack on the Dardanelles was the direct result of the conversations of the German Emperor with the Emperor Francis Joseph and the King of Italy. The Powers of the Triple Alliance would seem, on this supposition, to have agreed that the war must be brought to an end immediately by energetic action in the neighbourhood of the Turkish capital. If the Central Powers have so far identified themselves with their ally—perhaps in order to prevent her exhaustion by a prolonged campaign in Tripoli—it at once becomes a question of vital importance how far and in what form they are prepared to bear the consequences to which Italian action may lead in the Balkans. The Porte, it is said, has been informed that the Austro-Hungarian Government has warned the Balkan States, and particularly Bulgaria, that if they disturb the peace Austro-Hungarian troops will at once enter Albania and Macedonia. This would hardly seem to be a ground for optimism, but in the present circumstances the Porte is said to find even this statement reassuring.

But if Italy be now encouraged by her allies, what of the Powers of the Triple Entente? And here Turkish opinion is at a loss. It fears Russia. Rightly or wrongly, it is convinced that Russia is waiting for an opportunity to carry out certain aggressive plans towards Turkey. It believes that Russia has made some agreement with Italy. Nothing definite is known, but there is an uneasiness, a dread of what Russia may do. On the other hand, the impression is gaining ground that the English attitude to Turkey is growing more friendly. That is to say, as concerns the conception of the nature of neutrality in the present crisis there is no line of demarcation between the two groups of European Powers, and there is no real agreement between the members of each group. The interests involved are so many-sided, so complex, that diplomatic action in the form of the division of interests into two main groups corresponding to the two groups of Powers is out of the question. This circumstance may serve as a ground either for optimism or for extreme pessimism. For the moment Turkish politicians are inclined to be optimistic. They think that, in view of such a hopeless confusion and incompatibility of interests, aims, and ambitions, the consequence of serious disturbances in the Balkans would be so incalculably disastrous to the peace of Europe that all the Powers will prefer to unite to stave off the evil day. For that reason many Turks are inclined to believe that the Powers will find it possible—especially in view of the indecisive character of the first Italian attack on the Dardanelles—to give a guarantee that the bombardment shall not be repeated.

That is the form in which the situation presents itself to-day. The Turkish politicians hardly exaggerate its gravity, but they are probably excessively optimistic in hoping that it will be possible to obtain from the five non-combatant Powers at such short notice as the exigencies of war time demand so ill-defined and so hardly definable a thing as a guarantee against the repetition of an attack on the Straits. In any case, the present phase of the war between Italy and Turkey illustrates in a striking manner the growing inability of diplomacy to cope with the bellicose tendencies latent in European international relations.

Italian Reply.

(FROM THE "EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, Sunday, May 12

I have endeavoured to secure an interview with Signor Giolitti, the Premier, on the prospect of an early termination of the war.

The Premier, owing to the press of urgent State affairs, was unable to receive me personally, but he has given me, through one of his secretaries, the following statement for publication in the Express :—

It is not possible, at present, to make any statement regarding the possibility of peace. One thing may be said, however. Italy is not at all pressed to make peace for the war does not disturb either her commerce or her internal politics and she has largely the financial means to carry on hostilities.

The conditions on which Italy was prepared to cease hostilities up to a short time ago are sufficiently well known.

As for the absolute sovereignty of Italy in Libya this is a condition imposed peremptorily by the Italian people which no Government would be able to set aside.

As for the other conditions, it may be said that the longer the war lasts the smaller will be the concessions we are willing to give, for it is evident that if Turkey can only be induced to make peace when she will no longer be able to continue the war, we shall then have no more concessions to make.

As for the duration of the war, we are not at all preoccupied. You are in a position to witness in what manner the war is being borne by the country and by confronting the serene calm of the Italians with news of revolution in Italy, circulated by the Turkish Government.

You may judge the credibility of the reports emanating from Constantinople as to the condition of our finances. You may consult, for this, the statements which our Treasury publishes regularly.

From these statements you will see that though the Treasury is authorised to ask advances of about seven millions sterling from the issuing State banks at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, it has not so far been necessary to take such a step.

Only Way to Peace.

"EXPRESS" CORRESPONDENT.

Constantinople, Friday, May 10.

IN REPLY to a question how he thought it would be possible to arrange peace, the grand Vizier replied :—

It is probable that peace will come only by mediation and by a conference. My personal opinion is that it will be by mediation, because a conference would be unfavourable to Italian interests. On this point, however, you must see that I cannot express more than an opinion.

But one thing is certain. Turkey will not abdicate a single right which she possesses.

There is only one possible base for the conclusion of peace so far as Turkey is concerned, and it is the recognition of Turkey's effective sovereignty—not a theoretical sovereignty—in Tripoli and Cyrenaica.

The equilibrium of the Mediterranean insist that the sovereignty of Turkey shall be effective and not theoretical. To speak only of the religious sovereignty of the Khalifat is Utopian, because the Sultan is the Khalif of Mussalmans throughout the entire world.

England and France have every interest to maintain the equilibrium in the Mediterranean, and it is in the interest of general peace that Italy shall be prevented from extending her control along the basin of that sea.

If the Powers gave this liberty to Italy they would be acting against their own interests. This I believe to be impossible.

I sincerely hope that the Powers will study their own interests, as they are bound up with those of Turkey.

I asked the Grand Vizier if he could make any statement in regard to the Bagdad railway from Bagdad to Basra. He replied :—

We have submitted to the British Government the Ottoman point of view with regard to the solution of the final section of the railway and of the question of the Persian Gulf, and we are now awaiting the reply of Sir Edward Grey.

In view of the friendly sentiments which exist between the two countries, we hope for an entente in conformity with our mutual interests.

I asked the Grand Vizier if he apprehended any serious trouble in Albania owing to the disturbances which are again taking place there. He replied :—

There is nothing grave in the Albanian situation. It is being exaggerated for political reasons. An ex-deputy is at the back of the movement, but we have no fear of possible developments. The Government has taken all necessary measures for the maintenance of order and tranquillity.

As I took my leave of the Grand Vizier he thanked me for the impartial attitude which the Express has taken during the war and expressed the hope that the English Press would at the opportune moment take action in the cause of right and justice. He added in conclusion : "We count on the impartiality of the Cabinet in London."

Misery in Italy.

It is reported from Milan that the prolongation of the war is intensifying the serious industrial commercial crisis in various parts of Italy. Thousands are starving in the Southern Provinces on account of the heavy rise in the price of foodstuffs and the wide spread unemployment. A general strike has been proclaimed at Cerignola, and mass meetings are being convened in Northern Italy. In the big cities acute misery is experienced by the working classes. The price of bread is higher than ever.

Il Secolo demonstrates that the recent dearthness is due to war, prices being three or four francs in excess of the rises in England and other countries. There is an enormous increase in the consumption of horseflesh and such-like inferior foods. Even in Turin, where the poorer classes have shown a marked traditional repugnance for this sort of meat, the eating of horseflesh has been recently growing by leaps and bounds till the consumption is now actually 100 per cent greater than five years ago.

Forty thousand skilled workmen are standing idle in Milan, the number of unemployed during the first quarter of this year surpassing that of the unemployed during the entire 12 months of 1911. Only 7,000 bricklayers are now at work, as against 25,000 last year.

The textile industries of Lombardy have lost at one fell swoop full three-fourths of their export trade. No such large number of failures in banking concerns and commercial enterprises is remembered in recent years. Factories are constantly shutting down owing to the crisis. Money everywhere is tight, and banks are declining to give credit. —The Levant Herald

The Havoc of War.

A correspondent writes :—If any explanation were needed for the determined opposition to Italian aggression in Tripoli by the Arabs, a recent letter to the Secolo of Milan will help to afford it. Says the writer, Signor Lucatelli :—

I know not whether, as some hope, the desert may be transformed into an oasis, but certain it is the oases may be changed into a desert. One needs only to wander about the oases of Tripoli and to see them yellow and withered, slowly fading into solitude and desolation, to understand how in the absence of man this once fertile soil is hastening to death,—oases which only last October were dense with luxuriant vegetation, and which seemed to exhale, in an exuberance of foliage and rich perfumes, a riotous manifestation of life. The soil is normally so thin and mobile that but for the unceasing vigilance of its cultivators the crops wither, the land takes on an ashen hue, and dies like a living soil. In these vast abandoned oases one feels that something is perishing around one with alarming rapidity. Apart from the material destruction wrought by the necessities of war—the formidable date palms mown down by the cannon or cut down to give free play for the riflemen in the trenches—there is a veritable and literal agony of the land, which might indeed be yet arrested, but which in a brief lapse of time will perhaps prove incurable.

In some of the gardens, whose former owners are either slain or fled, poor patches which the heels of horse and man have reduced to sandy solitudes, is now gathered an Arab colony, a refuge for all the human misery of the city and the oases—for the widowed and orphaned by the war, for deserted families that come, dying of hunger, to beg at the trenches. This miserable population is increasing without any diminution of the profound wretchedness of its equal. True, the Italians have at least saved them from starvation, but the promiscuity of their camp has debased them, they pass hours wrapped in fierce sullen distrust towards all, even to those who feed them, towards the doctor who tends them and to whom they confess their ailments only when they can be no longer concealed.

London All-India Moslem League.

THE following Representation was submitted by the London All-India Moslem League to the Foreign Office and India Office respectively on the subject of the new development in Italian activity in the Aegean Sea and the vicinity of Constantinople.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE, FOREIGN OFFICE

SIR,

The Committee of the London All-India Moslem League beg respectfully and earnestly to draw the attention of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the extreme gravity of the situation the latest development of Italian activity in the Dardanelles and the Aegean Sea is creating in the East.

The Committee submit that failure to conquer Libya, with which object the enterprise, condemned by the unanimous moral conscience of Europe, was undertaken, furnishes no justification for endeavouring to set in flame the whole of the Eastern World, to create an irreconcilable hostility between two great religions and to involve neutral Powers ruling over large Mussalman populations in difficulties by placing their policy in conflict with the cherished sentiments of their subjects.

The Committee have reason to fear that the direct and immediate result of Italian action against the Asiatic possessions of the Sultan, coupled with the report that some of the neutral Powers intend to take advantage of Turkey's difficulties to her detriment, will be to impel large bodies of Mussalmans from India as well as the Frontier to endeavour to reach the seat of war as volunteers, and it would be impossible for His Majesty's Government to repress the movement without risk of great unpopularity.

So long as the war was confined to the regions for the conquest of which it was undertaken, the Asiatic Mussalmans were brought into direct touch with the conflict and the influence of this League and of other Muhammadan bodies in India and elsewhere was directed to allaying the natural excitement among their own people by pointing to the evident desire of His Majesty's Government to use their good offices at the first favourable opportunity to bring about a termination of the war on equitable terms honourable to Turkey. But the extension of hostilities to the Dardanelles and places within reach of Constantinople, which is regarded by the bulk of the Mussalman world as the seat of the Caliphate, is calculated to act as an incentive to the warlike elements alike in the neighbouring States and in India to organize a system of volunteering for the assistance of Turkey.

The Secretary of State is aware of the extreme inconvenience to Mussalman pilgrims and the loss to Indian commerce that has been occasioned by the Italian blockade of the Red Sea ports. The Committee are requested by many of their Indian co-religionists to submit that the injury caused by the Italian action has been far greater than is usually imagined, for large bodies of pilgrims have been unable to leave Hedjaz for fear of capture by the Italian ships of war, and that the suffering and distress among them is very great. The present hostilities by intensifying the hatred against Italy will further aggravate the difficulties that stand in the way of an early restoration of peace.

The whole Mussalman world, not without reason, looks upon His Majesty's Government as the upholder of justice and fair play, and the Committee believe that the interests of England are directly involved in the maintenance of peace, not only in the Balkans, but in the whole of the Near East.

In view of these considerations the Committee earnestly pray that His Majesty's Government may be pleased to take such steps as they may consider expedient to prevent the further development of a situation which they really fear will prove most prejudicial to the interests of humanity and to progress in the Eastern World.

The Turkish Woman.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

As one who has lived in Constantinople for many years, and followed with close interest the progress of the Turkish women's movement towards emancipation, I should like to be allowed to correct certain impressions that have become current in regard to the attitude of the nation towards their aspirations. The active opposition to their wish for a larger measure of freedom than has hitherto been their lot may be dismissed as non-existing. There is everywhere noticeable a growing freedom among them. Nowadays one may see Turkish women constantly walking with their husbands; every day one hears of things that before the Constitution would have been impossible.

The statement made recently that women are condemned for not wearing the veil is one that my experience does not bear out. The veil is not considered absolutely necessary, although I may say that all the better class of women are very careful to wear the tcharchaf (the covering).

During the recent elections hundreds of Turkish ladies stood around the Municipality waiting for the news, and there was no riot, no disturbance whatever; their husbands and fathers, who saw them, seemed equally interested and quite contented.

Much has been made of a lecture delivered by the well-known authoress Halide Hanuni at an American College. It has been said that the lecturer addressed her audience unveiled, which was not the fact, as she wore her tcharchaf, and that her address raised a fierce burst of indignation among the orthodox Moslems. As far as I have heard she has received only praise from the Turks for her address. From the following excerpt it will be seen how little inflammatory was the nature of the lecture given by Halide Hanum on the position and the duty of the Alumnae in the Ottoman Empire.

"It is the part of women," said the lecturer, "to fight against ignorance, evil and oppression. No matter in what country they live, no matter to what race or religion they belong, they are the natural mothers of the human race and wherever they see evils dominant they must unite and fight them down. Here comes the great responsibility of our Alumnae. In this great Empire of ours there have been great political changes; but those changes do not concern us here, for politics is the domain into which at present women are not ready to enter. Women usually enter politics when they have a great part in the economical movement of the land, and that movement has not come yet.

"What concerns us here is the social evolution of the land. It is our duty to lay the foundation of a new life, a life more useful to the country, working towards higher progress, regardless of all obstacles. Here we are in a land where the larger number of women need help, spiritual, social, and educational, a land where we have to build purer homes—factors that will constitute a purer Empire.

"As I have said before, the strongest and most characteristic part of a woman is her motherhood, it is motherhood that has made of woman an eternal giver of the abilities of her soul. If a woman does not give her intellectual, spiritual politics to her children, neighbours, society, country, and the whole human race, it means that there is something wrong, there is something missing in that wonderful soul of hers. It means that the divine light that goes to the humblest and most ignorant woman's heart and makes her a mother to her own children and to her neighbour's, is missing in her. We, the Alumnae, who have had higher intellectual and spiritual opportunities, must pass on to others what we have gained. As in economics goods that are not exchanged are valueless, so the goods of head and heart that are kept for oneself are valueless. Men and women, but more especially woman by that divine gift of motherhood in her soul, must keep no good that is within. She is the guardian only of any great intellectual or spiritual abilities that she has, she is obliged to pass them on, she is obliged to illuminate her surroundings according to the measure of the light she carries in her soul. The light that the Alumnae carry in their hearts is brighter than the light, or rather darkness we see around us, and if we fail to give it to whom it belongs, we are traitors to the unique greatness of a woman's soul—motherhood."—The Daily Chronicle.

The Dardanelles.

THE world is talking again about the ribbon of sea forty-seven miles long where Europe and Asia are close neighbours. The world has talked about it before. In the narrows, twelve miles up from the southern entrance, Xerxes scourged the waters for their rudeness in sweeping away his first bridge of boats. They behaved better to the second, and Asia hurled herself against Europe, and failed. Higher up on the Asian shore a river empties itself into the straits. It is an insignificant stream, but its name is a mighty one in history—the Granicus. On its banks Alexander won the victory which led him to the Indus and Europeans to their first penetration of Asia.

On the opposite Thracian shore is the mouth of another stream, a mere rivulet—Kara Ova. Sow the people call it now. But it gave its former name, Ægospotamos, to the battle which ended the Peloponnesian war. A little to the south of it is a bight; Akbashi Liman is its name. It used to be Sestos, but it has been Akbashi Liman ever since Suleiman I. planted his drums and horse-tails there. It is the first bit of European soil held by the Ottoman Turks. They did not conquer Constantinople for more than a century afterwards. Miles away to the north, where the Dardanelles open into the Propontis is Gallipoli, conspicuous on the shore, the first European town to be occupied by the Turks, in 1357. The grey old keep which frowns above it was built a few years later by the Mayazid the Thunderbolt. This Asian invasion of Europe was more permanent than that of Xerxes. It rolled up to the walls of Vienna, and has been receding ever since from that high-water mark.

The Ottomans are extremely sensitive as to the inviolability of this strip of coast on the narrow seas, their first foothold, followed by such a rapid stride. They have not held it unmolested. Venice gave them some hard knocks. On this very spot Mocenigo took or sank the Turkish fleet, some seventy sail, big and little, in 1656. But the Turks quickly built another fleet, drove out the Venetians, and dislodged them from the neighbouring island of Lemnos—not an easy task, for the position is strong. It was then that Sultan Mohamed IV., in order to prevent future raids, constructed the forts which the Italians bombarded the other day. Sedul Bahr—Barrier of the Sea,—at the southern extremity of the straits on the European side, is faced, across two miles off water, by Kum-Kaleh—Sand Fort,—on a low sandy spit near the mouth of the Simois. The entrance cannot be seen until one is abreast of the forts, nor can Europe and Asia be distinguished from one another. Those white cliffs which remind you of England are in Europe, and the one in the middle is Cape Helles.

On your left you have a bit of an island about six miles long and three wide. That is Tenedos, notissima fama insula, with its attendant rocky islets, known as Rabbit Islands, though there are no rabbits there now. But on the mainland, divided from Tenedos by a narrow channel, there are plenty of snipe and woodcock on the marshy borders of a stream, and the adventurous may start wild-boar on the wooded flanks of that bold mountain mass against the eastern sky which relieves the dulness of the plain. The world has been talking about this spot for a very long time. The stream is the Scamander, the mountain is Ida, and the level dotted with olives and dwarf oaks is the Plain of Troy. That strip of beach beneath the six-sailed windmills—nine in a row—is where the “long black ships” of the invaders of Ilion were drawn up. From those white cliffs Alexander crossed and first set foot in Asia on that sandy spit and did homage to yonder mound on the rising ground above, doubting the while whether it were the tomb of Achilles. Whatever opinions we may hold as to that, there is no doubt as to the visit of the great Macedonian, nor as to that of Julius Caesar in after times.

The ruins of Alexandria Troas are visible on the coast. They used to be accepted as those of Troy, which was itself a legend ere Troas was reared. They were a quarry for the Turks, who fashioned the granite and marble into the huge Roobis shot which they used for their mortars. They may be seen piled in pyramids on the ramparts of the castles of Europe and Asia. It was with these that the Turks pounded Sir John Duckworth's squadron as he ran through the Dardanelles after his futile raid on Constantinople. It was no fault of the Admiral's that the expedition failed. He carried out orders that ought never to have been given, and he at least succeeded in forcing the Dardanelles and destroyed the Turkish squadron, consisting of a 64, four frigates, and six corvettes. His instructions were to demand the immediate surrender of the Turkish fleet, and, failing instant compliance, to lay Constantinople in ashes. The Turks replied by busily fortifying, and it was greatly to Duckworth's credit that he got his ships through the Dardanelles again, though not without loss. The story will be found in text-books of English history. The Turks' refusal to send away Sebastiani, the French envoy, was the causa belli.

This was in 1807. In December, 1808, a new British Ambassador arrived at Chanak, and the Treaty of the Dardanelles was signed in January 1809. His secretary was little more than a boy, still a Cambridge undergraduate, and destined to be a Minister Plenipotentiary at twenty-three. In May 1810, came another Englishman, whom the young secretary, an Etonian, “remembered as an opponent in the Harrow eleven, a boy in a flannel jacket, with a bat over his shoulder.” The Etonian was Stratford Canning, known later as Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and to the Turks even to-day as beynâ el-ekhi, the “Great Ambassador.” The Harrovian was Byron. Just above the town of Chanak is a low point on which the Turks have their heaviest battery. That is Abydos, the goal of Leander and the landing-place of Byron, his emulator. His companion in the famous swim, Lieutenant Ekenhead, of the Royal Marines, whose name has been handed down to posterity on that account, met with an untimely end afterwards. He was killed by falling from the fortifications at Malta. Byron had done harder things. Crossing the Tagus was one, with wind and tide against him. It took a longer time—two hours—for a much shorter distance. A noteworthy swimmer was Dr. Julius Millingen, who crossed the Bosphorus where the current is fierce. It is worth noting that he was the son of the Dr. Millingen, who attended Byron at Missolonghi, and to whom we owe the account of his last moments.

These are trivialities, perhaps, but they relieve the venerable story of the Hellespont reaching back to Jason and the Argonauts. It has not been all battles, there come back memories of picnics at Lapsaki—once Lampsacus, the prettiest spot on the rather solemn shores. And looking across from the heart-shaped keep of Kilid el Behr—the Key of the Sea—to the white walls of Chanak one recalls pleasant hours under an English roof-tree, whence hospitality has been dispensed to at least two generations of pilgrims to the plain of Troy.—F in the Manchester Guardian.

WAR CARTOONS.

The “Times of India” says:—

“Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the ‘Comrade’ have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.... The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The ‘Comrade’s’ artist.... knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him..... Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....as a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The ‘Comrade’ is to be congratulated on their production.”

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

Apply to the Manager, THE “COMRADE,”
109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Does Your Wife Observe Pardah ?

If so, she must have necessarily been using the ugly and uncomfortable Old-Fashioned Burqa or merely a Chadar.

If you have not yet provided her with a “Newly-Invented Burqa,” designed by Saidah Ahmad Begum of Delhi and approved by

H. H. The Begum Sahiba of Bhopal

Passed by the Committee of Judges “Indian Ladies’ Art Exhibition” held with the M. O. E. Conference at Lucknow 1900 as the “Best Pardah Keeper” to meet the public wants.

Quite up-to-date, fashionable, easy wearing and most comfortable it is and fully performs the duty for which it is made.

You shall wonder to know that only for

Rupees Ten

You can have a “Naimish Burqa.”

From

The Khatoon Stores, Delhi.

N. B.—Ladies’ and Children’s clothing, household and toilet requisites, etc., can be had at reasonable prices.

5-6-12.

بابت ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ ع

موسم بہار کا دورہ گزرا ہے۔ لیکن ہمارے ماہوای جدید ضمیمہ سال بہر میں بارہ مرتبہ شائع ہو کر اپنا گھٹ لگا ہے۔ چنانچہ حسب معمول تازہ ہفت روزہ ضمیمہ بابت ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ ع بغرض ضمیمہ طبع شائع ہوا۔ گراموفون پیش کیا جاتا ہے۔ اور واضح رہے کہ یہ سال حال کی آخری ششماہی کے اعلیٰ ترین رکارڈوں کا نچور میں جنہیں ذیل کے مشہور اور مقبول گانے والوں نے عجیب و غریب انداز کیساتھ تیار کیا ہے۔ یعنی دو طرفہ رکارڈ - ۱۰ - الیچ والے جن میں چیدہ چیدہ اور منتخب گانے ہیں - ۶ - گوئیوں کے گانے ہیں - قیمت فی رکارڈ تین روپیہ - ان کے علاوہ اور گانے بھی اسٹاک میں موجود ہیں -

(۱) محمد حسین ماسٹر اف مارمولیم (کون ہے جو اس سے واقف نہیں) یہ اپنے طرز کا ایک ہی گانے والا ہے جیسا کہ لاجواب گاتا ہے ویسا ہی مارمولیم بھی بجاتا ہے۔ اس کے رکارڈوں کی بہت مالک ہے۔

(۲) (موج الدین) یہ وہی پروفیسر موج الدین ہیں جن کو نئی موسیقی میں کمال حاصل ہے ان کے گانے کی اسان دہان نہیں دے سکتا۔

(۳) (پیارا صاحب) ان کا گانا تمام اطراف ہندوستان میں مقبول ہے۔

(۴) (سہراب جی) الفریڈ کمپنی کے سہراب جی ایک نامور اکیو ہیں۔ جن سے بچہ بچہ واقف ہے ان کے گانے میں غصہ کی لہ دار ہے اور ہلکی ٹھہرنی ہوتی ہے۔ اور سہراب جی تو ان پر قول مار گیا ہے۔

(۵) (سہراب جی دہیو) یہ رکارڈ اچھوتی الہاز سے سہراب جی دہیو نے بنایا ہے۔ مراقبہ حاضر جوابی اور موزوں پہیلیاں سننے میں بے قابل ہیں۔

(۶) (تعلیم حسین لکھنوی) غنائی انڈیا بہر میں ان سے بہتر کوئی نہیں بچا سکتا اور کمال یہ ہے کہ بچہ بچہ اسکا معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ کوئی خوش الحان کوٹیا گارہا ہے۔

دی گراموفون کمپنی لمیٹڈ
پوسٹ بکس نمبر ۴۸ کلکتہ

TO LET.

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh, B.A., I.I.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta

The All-India Tea & Trading Co., Limited.

Head Office:—SYLHET.

Capital:—Rs. 10,00,000 (Ten Lakhs)
Divided into 40,000 shares of Rs. 25, payable in five annual instalments

A large area 5,300 acres, suitable for tea has already been secured, and the work of reclamation commenced from November 1911.

Board of Directors:—Hon'ble D. C. Deb Bahadur, Senior Government Pleader, Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid, B.L., Zemindar and Tea proprietor; Babus N. K. Roy, Dastidar, Zemindar; S. M. Chaudhury Zemindar and Tea proprietor; R. N. Sarma, Zemindar and Tea proprietor; K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Export; M. C. Datta, pleader, N. N. Datta, B.L., pleader; P. C. Datta, B.L., pleader; D. N. Datta, Manager, Kalmagar Tea Estate; H. C. Sinha, pleader; J. Tushnet, Merchant and Tea proprietor, Dr. B. K. Nandy, L.M.S., and proprietor, Baikunathapur Agricultural Farm.

Managing Director:—Hon'ble Maulvi Syed A. Majid

Secretary:—Babu H. C. Sinha.
Organisers:—Babus S. C. Sinha, late Editor, Weekly Chronicle, K. N. Das, Merchant and Tea Export.

Bankers:—The Sylhet Loan Co., Ltd.
Already a considerable number of shares has been taken up.

Reliable and respectable Agents for sale of shares are wanted in all parts of India and Burma.

For Form and Prospectuses, etc., apply to—

H. C. SINHA,

8-6-12.

Secretary.

The Regular Homoeopathic College,

113-2, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta.

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopath, Dr. R. C. Nag, M.D., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica," Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, for teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years. (II) L.M., S. & (II) M.B. titles. Most regular lectures. The Staff most experienced and efficient and includes Drs. Younan and I. M. Mullick. Best lectures in "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class. Dissection arranged. Evening Classes. A few free Studentships for deserving Mohammedan students. Rooms fitted with electric lights and fans. New Sessions open on the 3rd June. Apply to the SUPERINTENDENT at 47, Cornwallis Street Calcutta. 25-6-12.

WANTED

CANVASSERS

Apply for terms to:—MANAGER,

"The Comrade,"

109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN
TYPOGRAPHICAL
DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
+ CALCUTTA +

In Aid of The Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman
of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

Nos. { 9-12524.

9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of
The Gramophone Company,
Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A. :—

"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth"

"It is doing a glorious work"

Professor Houtsma, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopædia of Islam :—"Extremely interesting"

Count Tolstoi :—"The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews :—"Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the 'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and Rs. 4-8 or 6s. for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,
REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Qadian, Punjab.

5-10-12.

DO YOU WANT TO EARN Rs. 3 A DAY.—

Reliable persons will be provided with Constant Home Work on DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS by Hosiery Manufacturers. Experience Unnecessary—Distance Immaterial.

DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS are easy to learn. We show you how to work the machine—to make the Hosiery, which you do at home. We purchase the finished work and pay you handsomely.

WHAT OTHERS SAY.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-Knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your Knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,

Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by / Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—MORRIS

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 24. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, June 15, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1.

CONTENTS.

PAGE.	PAGE
THE WEEK ... 529	PERASIA—
TURKISH RELIEF FUND COL- LECTION IN INDIA ... 531	News of the Week ... 538
TETE A TETE—	News by the English Mail ... 538
The Battle at Zanzibar ... 532	MOROCCO—
The Khelat Rebellion ... 532	News by the English Mail ... 539
The Birthday Honours ... 532	THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
Offences against Women in the Panjab ... 533	News of the Week ... 541
The latest Russian Ukase ... 533	News by the English Mail ... 541
TURKISH RELIEF FUND ... 534	News from Turkish Sources ... 543
VERSE—	The Situation in Albania ... 544
The Moth and the Butterfly ... 534	The Macedonian Commission ... 544
LEADING ARTICLES—	The Italians in Tripoli ... 545
Islam in China ... 535	Agonies caused by the Camel's Roll ... 545
The Persian Affairs ... 537	The Economic Condition of Italy ... 546
	Turkey and the Dardanelles ... 546
	ADVERTISEMENTS ... 547-548

The Week.

Durbar Changes.

In the House of Commons on the 10th instant the Government of India Bill entered on the report stage.

Sir J. D. Rees, criticising the Durbar announcements in detail, declared that the sole policy of the Government in India as in England was one of surrender to agitation. Such policy, he said, would be absolutely fatal to India. He dealt at length with the views of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, and read out the Chamber's resolution of protest. He declared that the Chamber was composed of men as well fitted to deal with the matter as any official. He pointed to the failure of the recent gold loan as an instance of the flow of British capital to India being impeded by the removal of the capital from the industrial centre. Sir J. D. Rees concluded, "It is impossible to pass over these momentous changes in silence, though it might be undesirable to compromise the position of the Crown in India in the slightest, by dividing on the Bill, but the change has been secretly discussed, rushed, and forced upon the people of India." It might be said that nothing could now be done, but he believed that public opinion could be roused, and the Government of India might be forced to treat Delhi as a standing camp. He only hoped that the Government of India would be forced to finance the new capital by loans, not by sums filched from the railways and irrigation. He hoped that the error of attaching undue importance to the discontented elements would be avoided for the future and that the old order of consulting those most concerned, those upon whom the Government of India have to fall back in time of trouble, would be restored, and finally that the scheme unnecessarily expensive and already pronounced a failure would as far as possible be abandoned.

The Earl of Ronaldshay said he accepted the situation because of the tremendous sanction given thereto by the announcement made by the King-Emperor amid circumstances of great solemnity. "But though the proposals were not widely criticized," he said, "let us not believe that they are not viewed with great apprehension in many quarters, and alarm and dismay in some cases. Recent events had led him to the conclusion that it is not wise to show distrust of the high executive officers in the Indian Civil Service. The Government ought always to be most careful not to create the impression that they give way to clamour, and to avoid action calculated to shake faith in the inviolability of their pledged word."

Mr. Montagu said he could not escape from answering the most grave charges Sir J. D. Rees had brought against the Government of India. He proposed, however, to leave for the Indian Budget the question of the finance of the Delhi arrangement, because it was essentially a part of the finance of the year. With regard to the criticism of the Bill and of the transfer of the capital to Delhi, he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that students of the Government in India for generations past had been impressed with the growing difficulty that there were two seats of Government in Calcutta, interlaced and intertwined. Delhi was an enclave, ruled directly by the Government of India and comparable to Washington. The Government of India had taken up a proud position in the historical capital and railway centre of India. Mr. Montagu, adverting to Bengal, said that the fundamental mistake of the critics of the changes was suggesting that there was a reversal of the Partition. There had been no reversal. He was accused of saying something derogatory to Lord Curzon when he ventured to suggest that Lord Curzon had had no policy in this matter. There was nothing derogatory in that. It was only a well-known fact. Lord Curzon had himself described his objects. Lord Curzon was perhaps the greatest administrator India had ever had. His object in dividing Bengal was to reform the administration of an unwieldy province. The unrest produced had militated against the efficiency Lord Curzon desired, and the Government had done Lord Curzon's work over again, and again divided Bengal, not into two, but into three parts. All they claimed was that the policy was likely to be more efficient, because the keeping of the national boundaries was more acceptable to the population. Mr. Montagu reproached Sir John Rees for recklessly accusing the Government of breach of faith. The words about the settled fact continually quoted against the Government were Lord Morley's. What Lord Morley meant was that the great administrative improvement from the subdivision of Bengal must never again be sacrificed and that the partition of Bengal would never again be reversed. But there had been no reversal. What was meant by a settled fact in politics was, it was suggested, that a thing once done was never to be modified by experience. That was the theory of crystalized Conservatism. He emphasised that the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal would lose nothing by the change. Mr. Montagu, referring to Sir J. D. Rees' presentation of the arguments of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, declared that, if Sir John Rees would consult the files of the Indian papers, he would be struck by the way in which the Chamber's alarm was ignored by the rest of India. He thought that the alarm was based on a misapprehension. When they saw better results from the working of the scheme, the fears of the Calcutta commercial community would be allayed, and they would share in the enthusiastic welcome which the scheme had received from the vast majority of the people of all classes. Adverting to the charge of yielding to agitation, Mr. Montagu said, that in Bengal, as in many other countries, there was an overwhelming and almost universal section who were peaceful and lawabiding, and an insignificant minority of irresponsible agitators. He challenged the House to say that, since 1906, the Government had been supine in putting down agitation. "Lord Minto brought back, as one of the greatest triumphs of his rule, the way in which he, with Lord Morley, had stamped out, as I believe, what is known as the seditious movement. You have not only to punish the seditious, but also to remove the just grievances which bring sedition recruits and prevent repression having the desired effect. The Government of India believes that the real wounded race-feeling and feeling of unfair treatment, spreading far beyond the miserable confines of the disloyal and rebellious, was as strong on Durbar Dayas as it had ever been during the irresponsible agitation, but no greater disservice can be done to the Government of India than carelessly to lump together the agitation, such as presenting of the petition against the University of Dacca, and the agitation punishable, let us say, by deportation." Mr. Montagu continued. "I venture to suggest that the responsibility of those who govern a country like India to listen to grievances is even more vital than in a country where votes are the armoury of the governed. If I have shown any irritation to-day, I can only plead that the charges of broken pledges are as annoying as they are in domestic affairs, and must be met by the Government which has an overwhelming responsibility for the good government of India. It is because I believe that I have answered these charges on a subject where party politics play no part that I venture confidently to commend this Bill to the House. It is the first Bill of importance connected with the affairs of my department which I have had the honour to introduce, and it is a Bill which I can recommend with enthusiasm because I believe, and believe all the more strongly to-day after this debate, that it will lead to the improved government and greater peace in the country which benefits to a greater degree every day by the fact that the British people are responsible for its Government."

Sir John Jardine remarked that judging by the results, the proclamation of Delhi had been entirely satisfactory.

The Bill was read a third time.

Labour Unrest.

It is estimated that, up to the present, only twenty-five thousand men have struck, namely, in Bristol, Southampton, Plymouth, Swansea, Manchester and Llanelli.

Shipowners have rejected the Government's proposals, whereupon it is understood the orders to call out all transport workers were issued on the night of the 10th instant. The National Executive of the Transport Workers has telegraphed to every centre demanding an immediate general strike. The Cabinet has been summoned to a special meeting to consider the situation.

The Unions affiliated to the Transport Workers' Federation claim a membership of 314,000, but it is probable that large numbers will not respond to the summons to strike. Thus the dock labourers at Barry have unanimously decided to decline to strike and Cardiff and other South Wales ports are also expected to hold aloof. The Sailors' and Firemen's Executive has issued a manifesto warning members to ignore the summons to strike. On the other hand, at Bristol and elsewhere, the strike has been acclaimed with enthusiasm. The transport workers' employers and the Port of London authority have all published manifestos justifying their positions. The transport workers appeal for money to feed 300,000 children and 100,000 women.

London dock owners have passed a resolution that the Government's proposals are not acceptable, but they are willing to negotiate with the men on the basis of cash penalties for breaches of agreement and freedom of the employers with regard to non-Unionist labour.

All the traders doing business with the Port of London have written to the Government accepting the principle of pecuniary guarantee, but emphasising the impossibility of federating all trades. In a manifesto the Port of London says it is conscious of the unjustifiable pretext of the present strike, but that it prefers matters to take their course.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain was to move the vote of censure on the 10th instant.

The motion of censure standing in Mr. Austen Chamberlain's name declares that it is the duty of the Government to protect men desiring to work in a lawful occupation, and that Mr. McKenna's claim to differentiate between cases in which the Government will afford protection and others in which it will afford it only after a breach of the peace has been committed, is unconstitutional and illegal.

The Labourites have given notice that they will move an adjournment to-day to call attention to the situation.

A deputation of the Chamber of Commerce waited on Lord Crewe. No publication of the proceedings will be permitted, until a summary has been agreed upon between the deputation and the India Office.

Cabinet Changes.

The resignation of Lord Loreburn is officially confirmed. Lord Haldane has formally taken the Great Seal and will take his seat on the Woolsack to-morrow, when the House of Lords re-assembles. Though it is understood that the appointment of Colonel Seely to the War Office is settled, no announcement has yet been made. It is stated that Lord Ashby St. Ledgers, formerly Mr. Ivor Guest, will replace Colonel Seely as Under-Secretary for War.

Papers of all shades of political opinion publish hearty eulogies of the past services rendered by Lord Loreburn and Lord Haldane.

Lord Haldane took his seat on the Woolsack on the 11th instant. Lord Crewe and Lord Lansdowne paid cordial tributes to Lord Loreburn. Lord Crewe added that Lord Loreburn wished it to be known that he resigned on grounds of ill-health alone. Lord Haldane, responding, said that he was filled with the sense of the difficulty of adequately following in Lord Loreburn's footsteps.

Sir Rufus Isaacs has been appointed a member of the Cabinet. The appointment of Sir Rufus Isaacs is unique. It is announced that it is entirely personal and is not intended as a precedent.

The German press makes bewildered comments on Lord Haldane's departure from the War Office, based on the cherished theory that his mission in the Cabinet is to effect an Anglo-German understanding. The German papers are unable to decide whether his appointment, synchronising with the arrival of the new Ambassador, Baron Marschall Von Bieberstein, is a good or evil augury for Anglo-German relations. Some are of opinion that Lord Haldane has been shelved to the detriment of Baron Marschall's chances of success.

Colonel Seely's appointment to the War Office is officially announced.

It is understood that Colonel Seely will be succeeded as Under-Secretary for War by Mr. Harold Tennant, M.P., Financial Secretary to the War Office, and that the latter will be succeeded by Mr. Harold Baker, M.P.

Afghanistan.

News from Khost shows that there has been no further fighting and that negotiations are proceeding between General Nabir Khan and the tribesmen.

The Englishman's Jellalabad correspondent writes that by the Amir's order the Governor of Jellalabad has posted a notice at the Jellalabad Kotwali that the Amir's troops, with the help of Aljaris, has defeated the Mangals and Judran rebels, and the Aljaris and the troops will return to their destinations after pacifying the country, and the Aljaris, who have brought some goods from the Khost country, are allowed to retain them. The Amir's troops at Jellalabad, with the Governor's staff, have left for Hungam Pachra and Mama Khel for the summer. The Amir has sent urgent orders to Salar Syed Shah Khan, Commander of the Asmar and Laghman troops, to go on tour every month into the illakas and send his reports of his tours weekly stating the condition of the illaka and to watch very carefully the movements of the people.

All is quiet in the Khost Valley. The Governor of Khost, Shahghassi Mahomed Akbar Khan, has been recalled to Kabul, and left Khost some days ago. As through his actions, the origin of the trouble was largely due, his recall undoubtedly helps towards peace.

A frontier correspondent states that the number of Afghan troops on the Herat border have been increased by order of the Amir. This step would seem to have been taken after news had been received that a strong force of Russians had been sent to Meshed to restore order there. It does not appear that the Russian outposts in the Kushk Valley or anywhere south of Merv are above the normal strength, and Afghan apprehensions may be considered groundless.

News from Kabul states that the sons of Jahandad Khan, the Ghilzai trader, who temporarily joined the Khost rebels, have been placed under arrest. They were employed in Afghan service and were, doubtless, considered in a way as hostages for their father's good behaviour.

Brigadier-General Abdul Aziz, the Afghan General, has arrived at Chakmanni with two regiments and has called in the Margés Jirga in order to discuss possible terms of settlement.

China.

In reply to Mr. Ginnel in the House of Commons, Sir Edward Grey said that pending the final issue of the Chinese loan, His Majesty's Government had assured their exclusive support to the Hong-Kong and Shanghai Bank, the British representative in the International combination, which, it is hoped, will render effective the aim of His Majesty's Government and prevent any return to the former unprofitable policy of International competition in Chinese loans. The support now given to this Bank in no way confers a monopoly on it for the issue of future loans, and I understand that the Bank will admit to full participation British houses of established reputation. We have no desire to take advantage of China's difficulties. It is China who wants to borrow, not others who wish to press loans upon her. If China can dispense with foreign loans, it would be a very great relief and put an end to many troublesome questions. It is clear that in the present state of affairs in China, if money is to be lent, it must be on proper conditions, otherwise Chinese credit will disappear, and confusion and chaos result, and I cannot support anything likely to produce these consequences.

A telegram from Kashgar states that Kashgaria is in a condition of anarchy. The head of an influential political society in Kashgar has been murdered, and officials are in a state of panic. The southern towns of Yarkent, Kargalik, and others are in the hands of the popular Militia, and all officials at Chotan have fled.

Reuter's correspondent states that owing to anarchy the Russian Consular guard in Kashgar has been reinforced by two companies of infantry and three squadrons of Cossacks.

News received by way of Kashmir fully confirms the recent statements as to the anarchy that prevails in Chinese Turkestan as a result of the revolutionary movement among the Chinese garrison. Mutinous troops seem everywhere to have overthrown the ordinary administration and installed officers of their own. They have been quarrelling among themselves also, and traders in Kashgar and other towns appear afraid of outrages. No looting, however, has occurred in the city of Kashgar, according to latest accounts, though business generally has been greatly affected. It is reported that Russians have moved three squadrons of Cossacks and two Companies of Infantry into the country to protect Russian subjects, and these detachments should have reached Kashgar itself a few days ago.

Tibet.

It was definitely settled that the Dalai Lama and suite were to leave Kalimpong on Thursday, the 5th current.

Serious fighting is expected to follow this move. Those who have followed his fortunes declared that the false move made by him first was when he threw himself into the arms of the Chinese in Lord Curzon's time and again when he became an involuntary guest of the British Government. The reception that will be his portion is not difficult to predict, but it is to be hoped that it will not embroil the Government into more punitive expeditions on account of the lives of its subjects who accompany the Dalai Lama.

Opium Trade.

PEKIN messages continue to indicate that the opium situation is daily growing worse, and in spite of Sir John Jordan's earnest remonstrance the Pekin Government has failed to compel the provincial authorities to pass certified opium into the interior. The Government of India, it is believed, are inclined to continue the sales, as their suspension is regarded as unsound on political and commercial grounds. The situation, however, is receiving the closest attention of the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and some definite decision will be reached before long.

Indian Assistant Surgeons.

THE British Medical Council has adopted the recommendations of the committee with regard to the admission of members of the Assistant Surgeon Branch of the Indian Subordinate Medical Department to an examination for a British qualification. Only certificates of qualifications of intending candidates drafted by the India Office will be considered.

Council Regulations.

IN connection with the revision of Council Regulations all provincial Governments except Bengal and Punjab have sent up their recommendations and letters from these provinces are expected almost immediately. The Government of India will then proceed with the discussion and it is yet unsettled whether a committee of the Executive Council will be entrusted with the task of dealing with the regulations as was done on the last occasion.

It was understood that the Hon. Mr. Bhupendranath Basu and Mr. Surendranath Banerjee would have had the privilege of personally laying their suggestions as to the expansion of the electoral regulations before the Executive Council, but, as it was subsequently found that such a procedure would create a precedent which might hereafter be found embarrassing, they were given an opportunity of having a further interview with each member of the Executive Council individually in order that further fuller explanation of the needs of the middle class for increased representation may be advanced. This meeting, which lasted fully two hours with the Hon. Mr. P. C. Lyon and Sir William Duke, took place at the residence of the latter and the interviewers were assured that their suggestions would receive a carefully sympathetic consideration. It is understood that, if necessary, both gentlemen will proceed to Simla to press their views with the Government of India.

New Delhi.

THE Delhi town-planning experts have condemned the swampy Durbar area as the site of new Delhi and have suggested instead building the capital on the higher and more salubrious ground to the south-west of Delhi. The new site is on the right hand as one leaves existing Delhi by the Ajmer gate and proceeds southwards towards the Kutb Minar. The ground here is more open and free of ruins, and it rises gradually to the breezy uplands of the Aravali Hills of which the historic Ridge is a continuation. These are here only a hundred feet or so high but they break the monotony of the plain and will lift the houses out of the dust. They are close to the road at first but diverge gradually from it as one proceeds southwards, the level area of cultivation being about two miles broad at Saftar Jang's Tomb, a fine building close to the road on the right some four miles south of the Ajmer gate. To the west of the hills the country is open and should afford an excellent manoeuvring ground for the brigade which will no doubt eventually be located there. The only objection is to be found in the distance some five miles as the crow flies, separating the new site from the Civil Lines where it has been proposed to erect accommodation for the Government of India as a temporary arrangement. There is still time, however, to remedy this defect if any nearer location can be found, as little has yet been done to the temporary quarters, and now that the site of the permanent city has been decided upon the question of arranging that the temporary one should be in its closer neighbourhood will no doubt be carefully considered.

The view is now entertained that it will be not before five years at least that the Government of India will occupy the new city. The planning of cantonments to the west of the permanent city is being taken in hand.

Hindu University.

A HINDU University meeting was held at Naini Tal at very short notice and resulted in subscriptions of some sixty thousand rupees. The Maharaja of Darbhanga left for Aligarh.

Moslem University.

THE Maharaja of Darbhanga reached Aligarh on the morning of the 9th instant. A large gathering received him at the railway station. In the evening he was shown over the various college buildings. On Monday morning a meeting was held in the college premises. Nawab Viqar-ul mulk, Mr. Aftabahmad, the Maharaja Bahadur, and Nawab Mozammil-ulla Khan made speeches on the necessity of unity between Hindus and Muhammadans. The Maharaja Bahadur gave Rs. 20,000 to the Moslem University he had promised previously. He left Aligarh on the night of the 10th instant.

The Imperial Council.

Mr. Montagu, replying in the Commons to Sir J. D. Rees, said that it was not proposed at present to increase the number of members of the Viceroy's Council, but that certain re-arrangements were contemplated as regards the position of provincial representatives as whole-time members of the Imperial Council, the exact cost of which cannot yet be estimated.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND COLLECTION IN INDIA.

Name of place.	Name of person in charge of the Fund.	THE WEEK'S PROGRESS.						PROGRESS UP TO DATE.				REMARKS
		Amount collected.		Amount forwarded		To whom for-warded and through what Agency.	Amount collected		Amount forwarded.
		Rs.	A.	Rs.	A. P.		Rs.	A. P.	Rs.	A. P.
Karnachi (Sind).	Seth Haji Abdullah Haroon.	448	10	1,407	1	3	The Rt. Hon. Sir Syed Amir Ali by a D D on the National Bank of India, London. The President, Comsant, Rongas Orsman by a D D on the Deutsche Bank, Constantinople	20,328	1	10,358	12	10	For week ending 15th May 1912
				£100
				1,500
				£100
				3	10	c	Misc Charges.

TETE À TETE

After a prolonged period of inactivity, an Italian force consisting of 14 battalions of infantry and a cavalry brigade moved out of the trenches at Tripoli and attacked the Turkish position at Zanzur.

According to the accounts that have hitherto reached, the fighting was fierce and resulted in heavy casualties on both sides. It continued the whole day and towards the evening the Turks, according to the Turkish commander, "were compelled to retire in face of overwhelming odds," leaving an edge of the oasis in the possession of the Italians. According to the Italian version the Turks lost over 1,000 in killed alone, while their own casualties were 31 killed and 263 wounded. The Turkish commander reports that his losses were 100 killed and 300 wounded, while the number of the wounded on the Italian side was over 1,000. In the absence of fuller reports, for which we shall have to wait a fortnight, it is obviously difficult to estimate the accuracy of the rival versions. One thing, however, is clear. The Italians had taken the offensive and they assert having carried the entrenched positions at the point of the bayonet. Manifestly, therefore, it is the attacking force that must have suffered much more heavily, unless, indeed, as the Statesman pertinently remarked, the Italian soldiers are bullet-proof. War news emanating from Rome have always been found to be wildly exaggerated and, in many cases, utterly false. The Turkish accounts, on the contrary, have never been found to be deliberately mendacious, and their general accuracy has always stood the test of scrutiny in the light of fuller knowledge. It is, therefore, impossible not to accept the figures given by the Turkish commander as approximately correct. Only a short time ago the Italians had made an attack on Zanzur in full force, but were repulsed with heavy loss. Rome, however, telegraphed the news of a great victory to the four corners of the world. Had not the correspondent of the Paris Temps with the Turkish forces exposed the lie, Zanzur would have continued to be associated with a glorious "victory" of a "glorious war." The oasis lies about 10 miles towards the west of Tripoli, not very far from the coast. An outpost of Arab volunteers assisted by a few Turkish regulars was entrusted with its defence. We can hardly imagine the Arab force defending the oasis could be much larger than 1,000. After the recent fighting the Italians themselves admit to have taken only an edge of the oasis; and it is probable the Arab attacks on the Italian position will soon be commenced. Whether the Italians will be able to hold "the edge" much longer remains to be seen. As we go to press the news of another fierce battle at Homs comes from Rome. As usual, the Turks and Arabs are reported to have left more than four hundred and twenty one dead on the field. In fact, it is claimed that the Turkish force was hemmed in by an enveloping movement, a part of it having escaped by flight and the rest having been "annihilated." It may be remembered that a great Italian victory was announced at Homs not very long ago, which, according to the latest mail news, appears to have been an utter rout of the Italians at the hands of a couple of hundred Arabs. We doubt if there are more than 500 Arabs and Turks at Homs. If they are killed in "thousand" in every engagement, big or small, we do not know whom the Italians are fighting against—the will of the wisp of the Sahara or the ghosts of the victims of their massacre.

The Mangal tribesmen of the Khost Valley, some time ago, rose in revolt against the local Afghan Governor, The Khost Rebellion, who had incurred their ire by his brusque and summary ways. The rising seemed to have spread with rapidity and, although no other important tribe joined the rebels, it, nevertheless, assumed serious dimensions and grew to be a menace to the peace of the neighbouring country. The Amir ordered a force of regular troops and a lashkar of tribal levies to go to the relief of the besieged Governor and to put down the rebellion. The relieving force, however, did not enter into the valley at once, but waited outside apparently marking time. The comments of the Anglo-Indian Press on the seemingly slow movement of the Afghan troops and their utter lack of organisation, in the meantime, waxed loud and sarcastic. Even the Times came out with a leading article which was a strange mixture of cold patronage, mild rebuke and condescending advice for "King Habibullah." The burden of the Anglo-Indian and British Press comments has been that the so-called formidable Afghan army only existed in name, that there was hardly any officer having adequate military knowledge and skill, that the commissariat arrangements were still in the most primitive stage, that the Amir lacked the vigour and strength of will of his father, and that the pacification of the rebellious tribesmen might well prove a task beyond the resources of the present Afghan Ruler. The news of the despatch of Mullahs on a mission of peace was received with sneers. It was even hinted that peace overtures had been rejected by the rebels. It has, however, come to pass that the rebellion is subsiding and the tribesmen are returning to allegiance without a shot having been fired. Is this not an achievement of which the Amir may truly be proud? The latest news from Simla states that "news received through Lahore from the frontier shows that a further stage has now been reached in the remarkable proceedings in Khost, where, contrary to all Afghan precedents, the Amir is negotiating with a rebellion and appears to be succeeding in winning over tribesmen who have just been in arms against his officials. His General has now entered Khost and summoned the tribal yuzgas to a conference, besides making a characteristic Afghan proclamation to the effect that the Amir is prepared to use force if necessary, though the armaments of Afghanistan are meant to be used against the enemies of Islam and not against his own people. From the news recently received that one of the more seriously committed rebel chiefs has taken refuge in British territory, would seem that the Amir's methods are likely to succeed. They are in curious contrast to those of the late Amir." No wiser method could the Amir have chosen to pacify the unruly tribesmen without useless bloodshed. But, perhaps, the latest jingoism of a section of the Anglo-Indian Press could only be satisfied if mountain guns had been instantly brought into action to mow down thousands of his misguided subjects in the name of prestige.

The names we would have most liked to see in the Honours List issued on 13th June are again conspicuous by their absence, though some effort has been made to recognise modest merit. As usual, most of the higher decorations and titles have gone to the members of the Civil Service. Without grudging that privileged Order of the Bureaucracy its enjoyment of the lion's share of the honours conferred by the Sovereign and the State, we may reasonably assume it would be infinitely better if the basis of selection were broadened. As we had remarked on an earlier occasion, State officials are not the only class of men who are spending their lives in the public service. There are a thousand and one ways open to a man to do some genuine good to the people, although his whole life may be spent outside the charmed circle of officialdom. To pick up such individuals for public distinction, whatever may be the form of their activities—provided they are honestly directed to the public weal—would greatly enhance the value of the official honours and would make them the genuine hall marks of useful and honourable careers. As things are they are simply like unto the wind of which Christ said that it bloweth where it listeth and nobody knows whence it cometh and where it goeth. Amongst the recipients of the honours, there are some names fully deserving of the distinctions conferred upon them. Among the new Companions of the Order of the Star of India, the names of Mr. Abbas Ali Baig, of the India Council, Major Sahibzada Obaidullah Khan, Commandant, Bhopal Imperial Service Troops, Mr. Moreland, I.C.S., of the United Provinces, and Mr. E. A. Gait, Census Commissioner for India may be particularly mentioned. Mr. G. A. Grierson's K.C.I.E. is a just recognition of his great scholarship and erudition and his position as, perhaps, the highest living authority on the languages of India. The great explorer Mr. M. A. Stein, of the Archaeological Department, receives a K.C.I.E. His researches and explorations in Central Asia, conducted amidst great difficulties and with immense patience and labour, have won for him a world-wide renown. His name would lend distinction to the eminent Order into which he has entered. A number of the Companionships of the Indian Empire go to the civilians of Madras. Mr. T. W. Arnold's C.I.E. must be peculiarly gratifying to the large circle of his friends and admirers in India and particularly to his many friends and associates and old pupils of Aligarh, where he is still a name to conjure with. A scholar of great merit, he has been, ever since his retirement from India, discharging the arduous duties of the Educational Adviser to Indian students, besides his ordinary work as Librarian of the India Office. We have also read with pleasure the name of Dr. Edward Denison Ross, Assistant Secretary, Education Department, amongst the recipients of the C.I.E's. Dr. Ross is a well-known figure in the literary circles of Calcutta. He has done useful and varied work during his interesting career. He has always commanded respect as a scholar and an educationist. As head of the Calcutta Madrasa for many years he had unique opportunities for studying the educational needs of the Mussalmans of Bengal, and his long connection with that institution has, we are sure, created in him an abiding interest in the question of Moslem education. The Honorary rank of Major has been conferred on Nawab Mohamed Nasrulla Khan, eldest son of H. H. the Begum of Bhopal. The Knighthood bestowed on Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair, Judge of the High Court, Madras, is well deserved by that zealous and vigorous champion of the cause of the Hindu social reform. The number of the new Khan Bahadurs and Rai Bahadurs, Khan Sahebs and Rai Sahebs is, as usual, sufficiently large, and we hope the honour is in every case, fully deserved. We note with gratification that Babu Ganga Prasad Varma, Editor, the Advocate, Lucknow, has been made a Rai Bahadur. We had been led, in common with many others, into the error of supposing that he had been made a Rai Saheb on the occasion of the Durlar. The honour has come richer by being a little late, and, we are sure the recipient has fully deserved it.

STATISTICS relating to the offences committed against women in the Panjab furnish a melancholy reading. Taking all the offences under various heads it would appear that about ten thousand persons were tried in 1910. The number of cases that ended in conviction is about 30 per cent. In the absence of the statistics relating to previous years we cannot say if the offences of this nature show a tendency to increase. Even as they are, they disclose a grave social danger which calls for urgent, close, and exhaustive treatment. The social conditions in the Panjab have for some time past been subject to a process of transition. Apart from the new economic forces that are silently affecting the relative value of social relations, a new spirit of intellectual change, is in the air, which is profoundly modifying the old moral standards. These are, however, general causes, more or less operative throughout India. The problem as it affects the Panjab must be studied with reference to the peculiar circumstances and social conditions of the province. Disparity in the proportion of the two sexes cannot fully account for the large variety of the offences against women. In many cases the cause is decidedly trivial. Again, the motives are as various as the offences, and, indeed, even in cases of the same character the motives may be different. In considering the hearing of crimes of this nature on the conditions of the people as a whole, it is easy to lose sight of the facts and run away at a tangent in search of some fantastic explanation. The Punjabee of Lahore has of late been in the habit of dabbling in sociology. In a recent article on "Offences against Women in the Panjab" it has indulged in puerilities, some of which are decidedly amusing and a few not a little mischievous. We admire the following observations for their undiluted wonder and mystery—"The small number of female population, which can probably be traced from the time of the Mahabharat, has a weakening effect on that side of human nature which represents all that appeals to the sense of true emotion, culture, and art. Consequently, the rough and non-emotional side of human nature and environments gets an undue influence and power which grows with the strength gained in every generation." This is, however, a mild exercise in the art of the Inane of which our contemporary is a past master. One of the reasons advanced by the Punjabee for the existence of crime against women is the following—"For another, the domination of the Mahomedan element composed of very ignorant tribes who are the descendants of converts from the lower strata of the Hindus, is quite apparent. Hindu religion and Hindu civilisation have an undoubtedly ethical and progressive effect, leading to peacefulness and control of the aggressive and passionate tendencies of men. We do not deny similar wholesome effects in Islam and other religions, but their effect has not so fully permeated among a people made up by the accretions from various castes and communities never completely assimilated to the best side of any religion." We can not expect anything better from a paper that is in the habit of talking with profound gusto about the "spiritual democracy of the Hindus." It is refreshing to be told in the same breath that "it is difficult to find what classes of people are mostly concerned in the offences against women, to what religion and part of the province they belong. The official reports do not give these details." The evident pathos of the words we have italicised is rather heightened by the paltry implications contained in the passage quoted above. Need we say that we have no desire to defend the Mussalmans against these cowardly aspersions? We would only wish that Hinduism, a creed that satisfies the hearts of millions and for which we feel genuine respect, could have as its exponents men who really possessed "peacefulness and control of the aggressive and passionate tendencies of men."

ACCORDING to the London correspondent of the Punch, the St. Petersburg correspondent of the Standard says "that all private Mahomedan Schools in Astrakhan are ordered to close owing to Pan-Turkish or Pan-Islamic propaganda amongst the Tartars of south-east Russia." The latest phase of the Russian Autocracy is conceived in the true spirit of which it is the symbol. The representatives of official obscurantism in Russia always aim their first blow at the schools, for they, in their ignorance, imagine that by stopping all sources of light and knowledge they would effectually stop the growth of liberal ideas among the people. Their next move will, of course, be to arrest all those who show the slightest discontent against repression and send them to a life-long exile in Siberia. An army of rapacious myrmidons of the police will be let loose on the panic-stricken masses. With the help of outrages, exactions and tortures a perfect reign of terror will be established. Eventually a report will be submitted to the Autocrat of all the Russias by his faithful and humble servants that the "unrest" along with "Pan-Turkism" or "Pan-Islamism" has been driven out of the land. What is this "Pan-Turkism," one may ask, that is getting on the nerves of the Russian Autocracy? The Tartars of south-east Russia have a close racial kinship with the Ottoman Turks. They must have naturally felt some sympathy for the troubles of their brethren in Turkey and may have been led to give it a free expression. In Russia, however, freedom of expression is one of the deadliest of sins. Repression is its only remedy; and in Russia repressive measures are never taken by halves. The fiat has gone forth that all private Moslem schools should be closed. It may be stated here briefly that the Russian Mussalmans have organised a powerful and widespread movement for the organisation of communal education. They have started schools managed and financed by themselves which teach a curriculum of studies adapted to the special needs of the Mussalmans, in accordance with what is called "The New Method." The apostle of this educational movement is the famous and learned editor of the Tarjuman. We will deal with the aims and ideals of this great movement in a subsequent issue. The Russian bureaucracy has now frankly declared itself as the enemy of the Moslem progress. Will it succeed in suppressing a great movement for intellectual emancipation that has taken deep root amongst millions of the Mussalmans of Russia? One thing is certain. No civilised Power of Europe will dare protest against the brutal methods of the Government of the Tsar. The Russian Moslems will have to rely on their own resources in their fight against the forces of repression, tyranny and obscurantism.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND.

	Rs.	A	P.
Syed Abdul Hakim, Esq., Asthayan ...	10	0	0
Naimuddin Khan, Esq., Aligarh ...	5	0	0
Through Qutbuddin Ahmad, Esq., Naini Tal
Moulvi A. M. Mohammed Rafiq, Esq.,	2	7	0
M. Fidaulla, Esq.,	1	0	0
M. Qutbuddin, Ahmad Esq. ...	1	0	0
Shah Md. Abdush Shakur, Faruqi, Esq., Bikanpur	10	0	0
Nawab Syed Hosain, Bilgrami, Hyderabad.	100	0	0
Mrs. Syed Hosain, Bilgrami, Hyderabad.	50	0	0
Through Syed Hamiduddin Ahmad, Bihar—
Syed Hamid-uddin Ahmad, Esq.,	3	0	0
M. Ziaur Rashid, Esq., Dhubri. ...	1	0	0
Al-Khairat ...	2	10	0
Messrs. Habibullah, and Abdussamad, Delhi	10	0	0
Haji Abdul Aziz, Esq., Pleader, Delhi. ...	15	0	0
Gholam Mohammed, Esq., Bihar. ...	5	0	0
Peerzada Anwaruddin Sahab, Mahm. ...	1	4	0
Captain Hashmatullah, Sipri ...	7	4	0
Through Sheikh Daud, Carikal—
S. M. Saibu, Esq., ...	3	0	0
S. Bana, Esq., ...	2	0	0
Sheikh Daud, Esq., ...	2	0	0
Messrs. Syed Mohammed Hosain, Mohammed Sultan, and Mohammed Ibrahim, rupees one each.	3	0	0
Through Hayat Khanam Saheba, Lashkar, Gwalior—
Hayat Khanam Saheba, ...	6	0	0
Akhtar Zamani Saheba, ...	2	0	0
Taufiq Hayat Saheba, ...	2	0	0
Saghir Ali, Esq., Simla. ...	5	0	0
Asadullah, Esq., Budaun. ...	5	0	0
Through Maqbul Hosain, Esq., Kasauli Barabanki. ...	5	0	0
Through Mir Laiq Ali, Esq., Delhi. ...	12	0	0
Syed Fazal Islam, Esq., Sagu, Burma. ...	4	0	0
Mohammed Obaidullah, Esq., Patiala. ...	2	0	0
Through Hafiz Mohammed Mohsin Khan, Esq., Shahzadpur, Dist Muttra. ...	1,600	0	0
Amount received during the week ...	1,877	9	0
Amount previously acknowledged ...	17,019	12	0
TOTAL RS ...	18,897	5	0

Verse.

The Moth and the Butterfly.

A PANSY-PINNED butterfly,
Flitting from rose to mignonette,
Espied a moth on wings to hie
To where an open casement met
The dusking day with timid light,
That ev'ry minute grew more bright.
Said butterfly to moth in jest,
"What wings you, cousin, on your way?
The sun is all but gone to rest:
They tarry now who tarry may,
For flowers here are sweet to see,
And sweeter still for company."
But here the busy trifer spied,
Ere half his jesting speech was done,
A tall white lily by the side
Of a steep bank that kissed the sun;
And flitted forth incontinent,
On ever-changing pleasure bent.
The moth scarce seemed to heed the song,
But sped demurely on his way,
As one impelled by purpose strong
Whom way-side trifles might not stay,
Till past the curtained casement frame,
With deathless love he fed the flame.
But ere his life was half consumed,
I seemed to hear some murmuring,
As of a soul to silence doomed
(Though Death for him was rest of sting)
Who still would voice his inmost pain,
And would not make his passion vain.
That sweet sad wail no mortal ear,
Though kindred passion give it name,
May in the body ever hear,
For singeing wing and hissing frame—
Burnt-offerings of steadfast love
On the high altar reared above.
With inward sense he sees the light,
He feels it in his inmost soul:
He finds it fair, he knows it bright
He seeks it for his destined goal:
Welcome to him the chastening fire,
For love is one with love's desire
Shall love at love's hand seek for good Alone—soft sunshine and sweet shade.
And way-side blooms and blithe abode
In yonder smiling valley-glade;
Smooth paths that will caress the feet;
Sweet wines to drink, sweet food to eat?
Shall love at love's hand wince or cry,
If e'er frosts sting, or hot suns smite;
And bitter tears that bite the eye
Well up unbid, and aches that write
Strange wrinkles on the anguished heart,
Swart galley-marks that ne'er depart?
Go to! thy creed is wearisome.
Nay! may not love once smite for love?
Is travail vain? Do trials come
In wrath alone? Nay! up above,
Thy fire and light, thy wrath and ruth,
Are witnesses of one same truth.
Say which slays soonest—light or fire,
The sun speeds swiftest or the day?
Why need the fearless heart enquire
If wrath may quicken, ruth may slay,
When faith and hope are given to love,
And all conserved above?
A voice calls! and the exiled soul
Rejoicing, answers back—"I come!"
What boots it how the goal is won,
The way was long and wearisome,
The way was long, and bleak and strait,
And 'twas an agony to wait.
An unsung Idyll in his life,
The little fragile moth reveals,
The primal lay of mortal strife
To win the light that death conceals:
And dying thus he leaves behind,
A burning message for his kind.

Wanli

The Comrade.

Islam in China.

THE subject of "Islam in China" has been a fertile field of speculation ever since the affairs of the Chinese Empire were drawn into the orbit of international diplomacy. Missionaries and travellers who have from time to time visited the extensive regions of the Far East in quest of converts, pleasure or knowledge, have published accounts of the life of the Chinese Moslems, their strength and vitality, materially differing from one another and frankly based on the insufficient data of local knowledge, or on hearsay and chance impressions. Like the rest of China, a trustworthy and accurate history of the Chinese Moslems with special reference to their origin, growth, numbers and existing conditions is yet to be written. With the advent of the Republican régime the old prejudices against the modern standards of administration are sure to die away, and the time may soon come when an accurate estimate of the relative strength of the races and religions in a part of the world that has hitherto remained almost hermetically sealed will become available. Until such time all estimates about the population of China will continue to be received with caution, if not with scepticism. The glaring disparity in the various estimates that have hitherto been attempted, stamp them all with the character of indeterminate guesses or, at best, elaborate inferences from essentially local experience tempered by personal indiosyncrasy. The generally accepted guess—for it is scarcely better than a guess—about the total population of China placed the number at between 450 and 400 millions. Many doubts, however, have recently been expressed about the general accuracy of this estimate, and the consensus of opinion seems now to favour the latest guesses which bring down the total to about 300 millions. These vast variations are inevitable as long as the sole instrument of calculation is the missionary engaged in proselytising work in distant towns and out-of-the-way places, or a traveller "doing" the whole Chinese Empire in a fortnight, borne along the beaten track with the help of the "Tourist's Guide."

While, therefore, it is difficult to place any undue credence on the generally accepted estimates of the population of China as a whole, the strength of the Moslem element becomes still more difficult to ascertain with any approach to accuracy on account of its numerical inferiority and uneven distribution. Several estimates have been framed by those interested in the subject, which are conspicuous only for their wide diversity. The data available for such estimates emanate from three different sources. In the first place, we have the impressions of the European and other foreign travellers supplemented by random official records to which they could find ready access. Secondly, there are the figures compiled by different missionaries in their particular localities based on local knowledge. Thirdly, there is the opinion of the Chinese Mussalmans themselves. As regards the first source of information, the least that can be said against it is that it has grown stale through a long lapse of years, the latest estimate having been framed about 1878. Besides, it is hopelessly bewildering in its gaps and contradictions. We will take only a few examples. A. H. Keane, the author of "Asia," gives 30,000,000 as the probable figure, an estimate which the "Statesman's Year Book" accepts as approximately correct. M. De Tollenant, who was for many years the French Consul-General in China and is said to have devoted eighteen years to the study of the Chinese Mussalmans, gives the number in 1878 as 20,000,000. An anonymous French writer considers M. De Tollenant's figure as "toutefois exagéré" and thinks 15,000,000 more approximate. Mr. W. S. Blunt in his work, entitled "The Future of Islam," also accepts the same figure. H. H. Jessup, in "the Muhammadan Missionary Question," places it as low as 4,000,000, while Dr. Hopper of Canton thinks that the entire Moslem population of China does not exceed 3,000,000. Thus it would appear that the estimates framed by the most competent European authorities range between 3,000,000 and 30,000,000. It is remarkable that the figures rise in proportion to a rise in the standard of individual competence. A. H. Keane's statement seems to have been based on comparatively greater knowledge, closer investigation and sounder tests and methods of inference. All the same, even he, with all his scientific methods, broader outlook and freedom from bias, has achieved little beyond an elaborate guess.

Coming to the second source, i.e., the information supplied by the missionaries working in China, we cannot help thinking that in this case we have to deal with a class of men who cannot wholly free themselves from the reticences and the peculiar point of view of their vocation. A Missionary is nothing if not a partisan, and no one can honestly blame him if he looks on Moslem population in China as so much virgin field for the growth of Christianity. Naturally it would hurt his amour propre a good deal, besides committing him to an awkward confession of failure, to have to admit the popularity and strength of a rival faith. The serious flutter that was recently caused in the missionary circles owing to the rapid spread of Islam in Africa was primarily due to the loud warnings of a few enthusiasts who thought it more advisable to frankly recognise the existence of serious "Peril" than to go on keeping up a convenient fiction. As a result of this agitation an important Missionary Conference met in London and measures were discussed for an organised and vigorous campaign to combat the growing influence of Islam amongst the heathen races of mankind. A monthly journal, entitled the Moslem World, was also started, in January 1911, under the editorship of Rev. S. M. Zwemer, with a view to keep the Christian propagandists in touch with the "current events, literature, and thought among Muhammadans and the progress of Christian Missions in Moslem lands." The very first number of this periodical contains a long article on the Muhammadan Population of China contributed by Mr. Marshall Broomhall. The writer invited "over 800 persons in China" to send him an account of the Moslem population and his conclusions are based on the details "supplied by about 200 correspondents from different parts of the Chinese Empire." It must, however, be noted that the "correspondents" are mostly missionaries whose testimony is conflicting and mutually destructive, apart from the fact that it fails to inspire confidence even on its merits. The writer himself is careful to disclaim absolute accuracy in his estimates and rightly considers that "at the best all that is possible is a careful estimate based upon such data as is obtainable." With the materials at his disposal he summarises the position under minimum and maximum columns and, according to the table he prepares, the Moslem population in the Chinese Empire is calculated to be between 4,727,000 and 9,821,000. How far these figures accurately represent the strength of Islam in China may be best judged by the fact that they include the population of the Chinese Turkestan, a thickly peopled province, in extent about two-thirds the area of India, having a rich soil and genial climate and an overwhelming majority of Moslem inhabitants.

The statements of the Chinese Moslems at present available are few. Yet it is their testimony that ought to be the most reliable. They alone can be expected to have an intimate knowledge of the numerical strength and conditions of their co-religionists. It is possible they may be led to exaggerate things in their enthusiasm to impress the world with "the strength and glory of their creed," but it is safer to accept them as our guide than to rely on a "foreigner" who is absolutely ignorant of the country and is prone to "exaggerate" things on the other side. We know of only two statements made by the Chinese Moslems; one was made by Syed Sulayman, a Chinese Moslem official of Yunnan, during an interview that he accorded to the representative of a Cairo journal in 1894. According to his opinion the number of the Chinese Moslems could not be less than 70,000,000. According to Abdur Rahman, a Chinese Moslem scholar, who was also interviewed at Cairo in 1906, the Moslem population of China was above 34,000,000. The wide divergence of opinion even amongst the Chinese Moslems themselves indicates how utterly futile it is to expect that statistical accuracy will be attained in the absence of organised census undertaken by the State. Still, however, the calculations of the Chinese Moslems may not be as wide of the mark as all other estimates appear to be. Taking all the facts into consideration it is safe to assume that the Chinese Moslem population is somewhere between 30 and 70 millions.

Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Das, the Indian traveller, who has made a number of journeys through Tibet, read a paper a few days ago at a meeting of the Indian Research Society at Darjeeling on "Islam in China and Higher Asia." The Rai Bahadur dealt with the history of the growth of Islam in China, the political and social condition of the Mussalmans, their number, distribution, their manners and customs, and the general intellectual tendencies that are beginning to manifest themselves in the Moslem society to-day. The paper did not make any original contribution to the study of "Islam in China." It was for the most part a resume of the bewildering variety of impressions of missionaries and travellers which have found expression in a peculiarly loose and scattered mass of contemporary literature. The opinion of the lecturer himself seems to be equally indeterminate. In "Islam and Christianity in the Far East," published some time ago, he is made responsible for the statement that Moslems of China number 50 millions. Now he seems to have changed his mind and thinks with Mr Marshall Broomhall that they cannot in any case be more than 12 millions. Naturally no great weight can be attached to pronouncements that are so elastic and so obviously depend on extraneous authority.

To trace the history of Islam in China to its origin is beyond the compass of this article. The Arab traders first introduced the religion into the country within the first century of the death of the Prophet. It continued to spread and win converts amongst the Chinese population of the great trading centres, till a new and continuous stream of Islamic influence began to penetrate from the north with the incursion of the Tartars who had embraced the faith. Thenceforward the progress of Islam was steady and rapid and it won its way into the heart of China, the treming centres of population, and spread far into Mongolia and Manchuria. In some of the great provinces of China Proper the Mussalmans form about 30 per cent. of the whole population. Kashgaria is almost entirely Moslem, while even inaccessible places like Tibet have not remain unaffected. According to the very modest estimate of Mr J. R. Muir, there are 2,000 Moslem families in Lhasa and 2,000 more scattered over the surrounding provinces.

The political relations of the Chinese Mussalmans with the sovereign authority remained very straight and even cordial up till the advent of the Manchus in 1648. Within the last 250 years they were on three occasions involved in serious political trouble. In some cases they were persecuted by provincial authorities and grave religious disabilities were imposed upon them. With the birth of the Republic every vestige of the old spirit of persecution and hostility has disappeared. The leaders of the revolution have gratefully borne testimony to the energy and patriotism of their Moslem compatriots who materially helped them in their efforts to inaugurate an era of law, liberty and constitutional government. There is every reason to believe that Islam will enter on a fresh career of expansion and vigour in an atmosphere of freedom, which is its native element and is the supreme condition necessary for its spontaneous growth.

The social customs and modes of life of the Chinese Mussalmans, in some respects, stand in sharp contrast to those of their Buddhist fellow-countrymen. This phenomenon may furnish some food for thought to a student of sociology. Physical and social environment is a factor of tremendous power in the direction of human development. It is, however, a moot point whether the spiritual environment cannot, to a large extent, neutralise the effects of race, heredity and other secular forces. The Chinese Mussalmans have, in the main, sprung from the common Mongol stock. They speak the same language, live under the same laws and are subject to the same undefinable influences known as "physical environment" as their non-Moslem fellow-subjects. Yet they differ from their Buddhist neighbours in their social habits and organisation, in their manners, thoughts and customs, their deeper spiritual instincts and outlook on life. There are very few amongst them addicted to the vice of opium-smoking. The Moslem women never smoke. The Hui-Hui, as the Chinese Mussalman is called, does not, naturally, eat pork or drink wine. His nuptial and funeral ceremonies are conducted according to the teachings of Islam and, consequently, differ from those of the Buddhists. There is a greater confidence and vigour of character in him. Military service attracts him much more than ordinary civil avocations. He is more robust in physique and virile in personality. His hopes and fears, his joys and sorrows, his aims and aspirations are essentially different in the quality of their texture. This difference in the essential elements that constitute personality is manifestly the result of the dynamic forces with which religion has equipped man in his perpetual fight against the tyranny of heredity and environment.

The Chinese Moslems are fully alive to the need of a new intellectual synthesis. They readily avail themselves of the facilities for modern education recently provided by the Government. But their most earnest efforts are being applied to evolving a system of education suitable to their own peculiar needs, of which religious instruction will form an integral part. For this end in view they are establishing schools in every important centre by private subscriptions. In the province of Yunnan there are several colleges which are great centres of Moslem thought. Several institutions have been started for the training of teachers of both sexes, while it must be noted that several schools already exist which are exclusively meant for the education and training of Moslem girls. The Mussalmans of India may well take a leaf out of the book of their Chinese brethren and organise a workable system for female education. It is a rather sad spectacle to see them still wrangling amongst themselves, not only about ways and means, but about aims and ideals as well.

The future of Islam in China has been rendered much more hopeful by the success of the revolutionary struggle for constitution and liberty. The Mussalmans form an active, vigorous and virile element of the population and they are taking part in the work of political reconstruction with energy and enthusiasm. Their sense of civic responsibilities, their public spirit and their loyalty to the new régime have been publicly acknowledged by the new rulers of the country. They are as good citizens of the State as they are good Mussalmans. This combination is after all not as difficult of achievement as some would have us believe. A good Mussalman cannot but be a good citizen. The distinction that is sometimes drawn between the two aspects of a life's duty and purpose—be that life a Christian's, a Buddhist's, a Hindu's, or a Moslem's—is as unscientific as it is mischievous. An individual's duty to a State is but a part of his larger duty as a man, and politics get their ultimate sanction from the fundamental beliefs that sway human purpose. It matters little whether we call those beliefs Evolutionary Philosophy or Agnosticism, Socialism or Christianity; Theosophy or Islam. Professor Vambery, who was betrayed into a pitiful exhibition of ignorance and temper at the overthrow of his pet theories about the Chinese Moslems, was perhaps labouring under the same difficulty as men with a special weakness for generalisations have to face, because they cannot comprehend correlated activities of human life except in watertight compartments. The gross dogmatism of opinion that is sometimes exhibited in this respect even by men of undoubted capacity and some breadth of outlook is chiefly due to the surprise they feel at the stirrings of a new intellectual aspiration throughout the Islamic world. The activities of the Chinese Moslems are a part of the world movement for a great intellectual renaissance which is taking definite shape under the stress of modern conditions. It would be interesting as well as instructive to watch the new inspiration working amongst the various Moslem communities of the world. We shall deal next with the conditions of "Islam in Russia" in ampler measure, we hope, than what has been possible in the case of the Mussalmans of China.

The Persian Affairs.

We have often complained that the Pioneer can find no space for questions that interest Indian Mussalmans and on one occasion it could not even publish the contradiction of Enver Bey's death owing, no doubt, to pressure on space, having to record the death of an unknown merchant and the arrival of a Sculler in England. But we shall be unfair to our Allahabad contemporary if we did not give it full credit on this occasion for giving a whole paragraph in its issue of the 9th instant to the question of Persia and the views of Indian Mussalmans. It publishes a letter "from a Muhammadan correspondent lately returned from Persia," a certain Nanna Khan, whose adventure on the Bushire road forms the text of that pathetic communication. The Pioneer selects some choice bits to reproduce them in a paragraph with the stamp of its approval upon them. The writer of the letter does not, according to the Pioneer, share "the views so often and so vigorously expressed by All-India Moslem League speakers concerning the treatment accorded to Persia under the terms of the Anglo-Russian Convention," and it is enough for the Pioneer to pronounce the judgment that such views "are not shared in by Muhammadans who have had practical experience of the conditions at present prevailing in that much disturbed kingdom." The writer of the letter stated that while he was travelling down to Bushire from Shiraz with a caravan of Persians he was robbed of all he possessed "though I repeated the Fathihah (sic) and Kalama and showed I was a good Mussalman." He concludes the letter with a request to those "who do not wish to see any force used to their Persian brothers" either to make good to the writer and other Indian Mussalmans who have been robbed the losses they have suffered at their Persian brothers' hands or to visit Persia and endeavour to persuade these "brothers" to "disgorge the property they have annexed." We are glad that the Pioneer's pet correspondent excludes himself from the fraternity of Islam for the simple reason that some Persian brigands robbed him as well as a caravan of their own countrymen. But we should like to ask this Muhammadan with "practical experience" of the conditions at present prevailing in some parts of India, also whether he found the Fathihah and Kalama an effective talisman against the tactics of highway robbers in India which is not yet free from its dacoits. He certainly did not go to Persia on a national Islamic errand or for those who regard the Persians as "brothers," in spite of highway robberies and other disorders that remain unchecked, chiefly because the Anglo-Russian Convention has dumped a Power into Persia that has no business to be there, and occasionally dumps an ex-shah and his brothers who, but for that Power, could have never entered Persian territory, or left it alive. He either went to Persia to work for private gain or as the dependent of a foreign Power. In the latter case he may rest assured that he will reap a compensation beyond the dreams of avarice; and in the former case the robbery is only part of the bargain, and if he does not wish the experiment to be repeated he has an excellent guide, philosopher and friend in Persia's poet who says—

بدريا در مزارع به چهار اسب *
اگر خواهي سلامت بر کنار اسب

(In the sea there are innumerable gains, but if thou seekest safety it is on the shore.) The letter concludes as follows:—"I would like to say, Sir, that all Indian Mussalmans do not feel the same as these gentlemen aforesaid, and that some of us would like to see these insolent braggarts of Persians get the punishment they deserve and that the Indian subjects of the British Raj and also the sepoys sent out by the Raj, may feel that they are subjects of a Power which is not afraid to look after its own people. I am an educated man, Sir, and know something of the power of the British Raj, but what can I and other poor ignorant men think when we see ourselves used so and no steps taken to help us." As regards the feelings of Indian Mussalmans "these gentlemen aforesaid" are at least in some manner representatives of some of their co-religionists in India, but we do not know whom the correspondent represents—unless it be the Pioneer. The noble sentiments about the British Raj will no doubt be noted by the powers that look after the manufacture of Khan Bahadurs and the Pioneer will, we are sure, press forward through its subterranean channels the claims of its correspondent. There is only one possible hitch. The correspondent says he is "an educated man." Were it not for this almost insuperable difficulty, we would ourselves have placed odds on the Pioneer's favourite winning the Khan Bahadur Stakes in a canter. We should suggest that such as the Pioneer's correspondent should boycott Persia and turn their itinerant footsteps towards South Africa as "subjects of a Power which is not afraid to look after its own people."

The departure of Nasir-ul-Mulk, the Persian Regent, for Europe has not probably been necessitated by reasons of health alone. Though outwardly quiet, Persia is internally passing through that diplomatic crisis which immediately precedes the declaration of a "veiled protectorate." There is also a grave Cabinet crisis still unsettled. And although the scheme for constituting a Senate and the idea of summoning the Mejlis seem to have been shelved at present, they cannot be held in abeyance indefinitely—particularly when the "extremists" are being held in durance vile—for the Persian Railway Project shall have to be imposed on Persia, and some popular instruments in the shape of a pliant Mejlis and a Senate filled with Russian nominees will render the task much easy and smooth. Salar ud Dauleh has at last been put to flight, though it is difficult to believe that he is not preparing another dire threat for the Russian Government with the help of his faithful henchman, the editor of the Novoe Vremya. At this shapeless and fluid stage in Persian affairs, the withdrawal of the one man of undoubted capacity and force of character appears much like quitting a post of duty and danger out of sheer personal confusion and terror. We must, however, take certain other circumstances into account and see if there are no other causes that have driven the Regent in despair out of the country. There exists hardly any doubt now that Teheran is in the grip of Russian dictatorship. The imprisonment and exile of the most patriotic members of the old Mejlis and popular leaders of the people have been carried out by a helpless Government at the bidding of Russian agents. The Regent as well as the Government long ago lost all initiative and freedom of action. It must have been peculiarly galling to him to have to register the decrees of the Muscovite and help in the reduction of his own people to servitude. The Persian Railway scheme which, when carried out, will effectually reduce the country to bondage, loomed with fearful imminence before his eyes. Torn between his sense of duty to his nation and his country and the awful sense of the realities of the situation he could find no other alternative than to end his own mental tragedy by giving up the nominal direction of affairs. Some of us may think that a true sense of Persia's tragedy would have held him to his post. All, however, have not been cast in the heroic mould, and the difficulties of the Persian situation could be much easily solved if the legitimate freedom of action in internal affairs were allowed to men even of common clay. That freedom has long ceased to exist. We trust even Sir Edward Grey has learnt not to mistake the Russian designs now in process of development. He has, however, committed himself too far, and we do not see if the situation can be retrieved by mere good intentions. The petty incident on the Perso-Afghan border, which the Persian Government considers to have been an utterly trivial affair, created a greater sensation in the British Press than the Meshed atrocities. The Railway Project will seal the doom of Persian independence and endanger the safety of the Indian frontier. All the same it is receiving enthusiastic British support. We hope it is not necessary that the lesson of Muscovite perfidy should always come home to England on the stepping stones of dead nationalities.

Persia.

News of the Week.

News has been received at Simla from the Persian Consul-General that the latest news from Persia state that Salar-ud Dowlah has fled from Kermanshah, being defeated by the Imperial troops, who have taken possession of the city. The situation has greatly improved at Shiraz and Handaf Abbas. Intimation has been received that the Government at Teheran is perfectly satisfied that the recent reported encroachment of Afghans on the Persian border was not of any consequence and did not indicate any hostile attitude on the part of the Amir's Government. It is believed that the movement of the Afghan troops for the customary change of guards gave rise to a false alarm.

The following letter has been received by Dr Rash Behary Ghose from the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal:—

Political Dept.

Sir,—With reference to the communication addressed by you to His Excellency the Viceroy regarding Russian relations with Persia, I am desired, under instructions from the Government of India, in the Foreign Department, to inform you that the subject is one which receives the constant attention of His Majesty's Government as the friend of both the Governments referred to.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

(Sd.) C. J. STEVENSON-MOORE

(Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal).

Darjeeling, June 8th, 1912.

The Teheran Regent with his family has departed for Europe in spite of the fact that the Cabinet crisis is not yet settled.

It does not appear likely that Great Britain will be able to reduce the Consular escort at Shiraz. The assailants of Consul Smart have not yet been caught, and the road between Shiraz and Bushire is very insecure.

Mr. M. de P. Webb of Karachi contributes to the Pioneer an article strongly supporting the Indo-European Railway scheme by the Trans-Persian Railway. He says "Is the whole of India together with the wealthy and populous countries beyond to the east and south-east to be forever cut off from quick railway communication with Europe in deference to the out-of-date theory regarding the necessity of isolating India from the possibility of a Russian attack by retarding the natural development of Persia?" Mr. Webb to facilitate such development would like to see the railways carried straight through from Karachi to Teheran by the shortest possible route and without any break of gauge whatever.

Over ten thousand Mussulmans of both sects, Shiaks and Sunnis, attended a meeting under the presidency of Maulvi Abdul Majid, of Frangimahal, held at Lucknow, to protest against the high-handedness of the Russians at Meshed. Among the speakers were the Hon. Raja of Mahmudabad, Mr. Nahiullah, Barrister, and Wazir Hasan, honorary secretary of the All-India Moslem League. The audience was greatly moved by these three speakers especially and much indignation was shown. The honorary secretary of the Moslem League read a letter from Sir Edward Grey in reply to the resolutions sent by the League, also many telegrams, among others one from Hyderabad expressing sympathy. The following resolutions were unanimously adopted: (1) That this public meeting of mujahids, ulemas and all other classes of Mussulmans of Lucknow, places on record its deep sense of grief and indignation at the bombardment and desecration of the holy shrines of Imam Raza and the Gohar Mosque at Meshed by Russian troops which had been a great religious calamity, agitating the whole Moslem world and deeply wounding their feelings; (2) that this meeting respectfully but strongly urges upon its just Government, as the greatest Moslem Power in the world, to demand from the Russians the rest return to the shrines of all the sacred relics and treasures which have been carried away and to provide against the recurrence of similar incidents in the future; (3) that a copy of the above resolutions be sent to His Excellency the Viceroy with a request that it may be conveyed to the Secretary of State for India and through him to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Barmah Mussulmans in a general meeting, held on 9th instant in Abangin Mosque under the presidency of Prince Mirza Akbarakhi, passed a resolution placing on record their intense grief and indignation at the outrageous desecration of the holy shrine of Imam Raza at Meshed by Russian troops, praying that Government may in view of their religious feelings and sentiments be pleased to take such diplomatic action as may be calculated not only to allay their feelings but also to prevent effectively a recurrence of such sad and disastrous incidents in future. They also resolved that the 11th of Rabi-us-Sani every year be observed as a general mourning day in commemoration of the event.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "B. DAILY POST")

I have excellent ground for stating that as the consequence of a series of meetings which has been held in Paris, at which representatives of all the British, French, Russian and Belgian financial houses interested in Persia were present, steps are at once to be taken to organise an expedition for the purpose of exploring the country in a more complete manner than has ever been attempted. The expedition would concern itself primarily with areas known to be productive of minerals and oils, but close research also will be devoted to matters connected with archaeology and some discoveries in this connection of the greatest importance are anticipated. It is interesting in this connection to note that the Foreign Secretary is to be pressed from the Radical branches to-morrow to state the date on which the proposal for forming a société de études to promote a scheme for a Trans-Persian railway first came before the Government, whether any meetings of this society have yet been held; and when he expects to be in a position to make a statement or to lay papers in order that the House of Commons may have full information on the subject.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, May 17

After telegraphic communication with Teheran the Governor of Kermanshah has left the British Consulate and resumed the Governorship.

Teheran, May 20

After apparently gaining a victory in his usual sharp and decisive manner yesterday over Mujallal-es-Sultan near Hamadan, Yeprem Khan, Persia's best hope in the present weary internal wars, was foully murdered while writing a despatch in his tent, his skull shattered by a bullet fired into his mouth by an unknown assassin.

There is reason to suspect the assassination is due to internal dissension in the Dashnaksutian Society, which on 12th May I suggested was likely to mar the success of Yeprem's last campaign. It will be remembered that since the acceptance of the Russian ultimatum Yeprem, who never lost a battle and consequently possessed a prestige on which the Government always drew in moments of special emergency, was its principal prop as chief of police in Teheran. He had advised the Government to bow to the necessity of accepting the ultimatum, and unquestionably his presence gave all the Europeans a sense of security which the Russians during recent months have shown a disposition handsomely to acknowledge. The Society, however, held that its object was to assist Persian independence and that the recognition of the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907 removed that independence. Therefore, the Society was unable to fight on behalf of the Government. The question was finally referred to the central committee at Geneva which counselled complete neutrality. Nevertheless Yeprem held on his way, determined that Salar-ed-Dowleh should not enter Teheran. His death will undoubtedly demoralize the Government's force.

Yeprem is said to have been the son of a bricklayer. His youth he spent in plotting a revolution in Turkey and the Caucasus. He spent a long term of imprisonment in Siberia and achieved fame by leading an army from Resht to Teheran in 1909, the Sipahdar, the titular chief, being only a Persian figurehead. Last autumn he broke the power of the ex-Shah and Arshad-ed-Dowleh and defeated Salar-ed-Dowleh in the action I described at Meshed. Either of these victories might have been decisive if it had been followed up, but lack of support from Teheran in each case prevented pursuit. In these last months the ex-Siberian exile has been regarded by Russia as the chief prop of law and order. I have met at various times Boris Sarafoff, Sandaniky, Salar Khan and other guerilla fighters in national causes. Of them all Yeprem was the most gallant and most attractive on account of his sincerity and simplicity.

Teheran, May 21

Later telegrams from Hamadan affirm that Yeprem was killed in action. The Armenians and Bakhtiari joined hands over the dead body and swore vengeance, and continued the fight three hours longer, completing the rout of the enemy.

The fact that the enemy's defeat was severe seems to be established beyond dispute. Their number was 2,000, of whom 300 were killed. The Government force consisted of 800 Mujahids, 500 Bakhtiari and 80 Persian Cossacks with several guns. The guns lost by Firman Firman were recaptured. Forty of the victorious army were killed.

Tehran, May 22

The new advance required by Persia will be made, like the former, conjointly by England and Russia, but it appears probable that there will be one interesting difference. The English contribution will again be made by the Government, but the Russian is likely to be made by the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas with a view to ultimate French participation in the large loan. The amount of the total new advance will probably be £100,000.

Persia appears to be gratified by Great Britain's reception of the request for her good offices in the question of the Afghan frontier. Possibly the question will be settled by arrangement between Simla and Kabul, otherwise a Mission similar to that of Sir Arthur Macmahon in 1902 will probably be sent.

As the reconstruction of the Cabinet appears to be imminent, it is not likely that the Regent will succeed in departing so soon as he contemplated.

Tehran, May 23

The funeral of Yeprem to-day was the occasion of a vast popular demonstration in which many thousands of people took part. A mullah delivered an eloquent address over the grave. It is now established beyond doubt that Yeprem was killed by the enemy and was not murdered.

Advices from Kermanshah declare that Sahar-ed-Dowleh has now only a handful of followers. Mujallles-Sultan also appears to be in full retreat.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS.")

As "it is desirable more strictly to define the limits of" the British sphere of influence in Persia, an Order in Council has just been made repealing that of 1907 and delimiting the British jurisdiction thus: Mohammerah, with its dependencies, the coast and maritime provinces of Persia from Mohammerah to Gwettus both inclusive and the islands of the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman which belong to Persia. The maritime provinces are Arabistan, Fars, Laristan, Karman, Persian Baluchistan and those districts under the Persian Governor of the Gulf Ports.

The Order affirms that "by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, and other lawful means His Majesty the King has power and jurisdiction within the dominions of His Majesty the Shah of Persia."

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Odessa.

Muhammad Ali, the ex-Shah, who is still here, has been formally advised from Tehran that the young Shah's journey to Europe has been definitely fixed for the coming autumn.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" CORRESPONDENT.)

Odessa, May 19.

Lord Lamington, returning from his tour through Persia, was expected here yesterday, where despatches were awaiting him. As he wired instructions for his correspondence to be forwarded to Constantinople, he has apparently diverted his homeward route via Batoum and the Bosphorus. Lord Lamington's visit to Persia was made, I believe, on behalf of the Persia Committee in London. It has been a flying trip from south to north, accomplished in a few short weeks. It may have enabled his lordship to gather a more intimate general knowledge of the condition of affairs in the Shah's dominions, but it was too brief and superficial for a close study of the chaotic situation and the various factors and causes which continue to retard a durable restoration of peace, order, and security.

The ex-Shah continues to observe a sort of monastic seclusion in his villa residence here. He is never seen abroad. After his return here he received an occasional visit of courtesy from the City Prefect, but those gubernatorial attentions were discontinued. He declines to a cord audience to local Press representatives, but, as a matter of fact, neither the Press nor the public now take the slightest interest in Mohammed Ali or his affairs. During the first period of his exile here the ex-Shah took a lively interest in his surroundings. He was then lodged with his family, suite, and harem in a spacious and luxuriously equipped forty-roomed palace in the Gogul Street. He was daily seen in the city, occasionally in the saddle, but more frequently in a motor-car or well-appointed victoria. He visited by turns nearly all the local industrial works, and was inducted into the mysteries of the production of a daily newspaper. He was a regular hunting at the opera, the hippodrome, and the chief café-chantants. He was also a patron of the racetrack, and founded a sweepstakes in his own name. His second term of exile in the southern capital has no such royal diversions. Mohammed Ali is said to be in impaired health, and he has become extremely morose. It would appear that he has abandoned his previous intention of taking up his permanent residence in England; his majordomo is now looking for a more suitable and commodious villa-residence than that in which his Majesty, family, and small suite are very crampingly accommodated at present. Mohammed Ali Shah maintains a regular correspondence with his leading partisans in Persia, and is occasionally visited by emissaries from Gomehsh Tépé.

Morocco.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, May 16.

GENERAL LYAUTEY will leave Casablanca for Rabat to-morrow. He will, as at present arranged, stay at Rabat until Sunday, when he will leave for Fez. General Lyautey has instructed Colonel Gourand to meet him at Rabat and accompany him to Fez, where he will arrive on the 24th.

Madrid, May 16.

The official confirmation of the news of the death of the prominent Riff chieftain El Mizzian has created great satisfaction, and it is thought that it may hasten the end of the campaign, the duration of which, with the accompanying loss of men and money, has begun to create some irritation.

The following details of El Mizzian's death have been received. A group of Regular native Cavalry, belonging to General Navarro's advance guard, occupied a certain strategic position, whereupon splendid horseman, at the head of a large group of prominent Moors, advanced, calling upon it to abandon Spain, but a Spanish corporal fired and killed him on the spot. The Native Cavalry also fired against the group who surrounded El Mizzian, killing several Moors, whose bodies, with that of El Mizzian himself, were left on the field. The body of El Mizzian was subsequently removed to Melilla by the Spaniards.

Fifteen thousand men under the personal direction of General A'dave, the Commander-in-Chief of the Melilla Army, occupied and fortified yesterday positions from which they can render difficult further Moorish attacks on the main body. Sharp fighting took place, and the troops are known to have had the following casualties: Two lieutenants and 11 men killed, a major, four lieutenants, and 42 men wounded. The Moors left about 40 bodies on the field.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Madrid, May 17.

Although the most absolute reserve is still maintained here regarding the details of the Franco-Spanish negotiations it is nevertheless generally understood that they have now reached a stage when some definite results may reasonably be looked for. It is known also that for some weeks past the British Foreign Office has been actively interesting itself to promote a mutually satisfactory understanding.

When, however, the Imbarca, which is often well informed where Spain's foreign relations are concerned, says this morning that the differences between France and Spain regarding the valley of Wergha have been submitted to England "for a sort of arbitration," and that England has given a decision adjudging part of the disputed territory to each of the contracting parties, it is clearly going beyond facts. As the friend of both France and Spain Great Britain has by the desire of both parties been closely associated with the course of the negotiations since their inception, and has of late, owing to the difficulties encountered in the settlement of the conflicting claims relating to the Wergha district, put forward some mediatory suggestions with a view to promoting an agreement.

From such suggestions, however, which have no binding force and are of a purely tentative and auxiliary character, it is still a far cry to arbitration or even to a "sort of arbitration."

Paris, May 17.

Owing to the threatening attitude of the eastern tribes a battalion of the French garrison at Fez has been sent forward as far as the River Sebu, with orders to watch the enemy's movements. The French garrison is not strong enough to risk a general engagement with the rebel harka which already numbers about 3,500 men and is said to be making fresh recruits among the tribes.

Yesterday, at the first sitting of the French court martial appointed to try the askaris and others who took part in last month's mutiny at Fez, nine prisoners were condemned to death and four to penal servitude. One of the accused was acquitted.

Tangier, May 19.

The proclamation as Sultan of one of the sons of Mal Amin, which is announced from the Sûs district, may lead to very serious consequences. Mal Amin, who died last year, was a famous religious chief and sorcerer in the Sahara. The new Pretender's programme is financial, just as was Mulai Hafid's at the beginning of his reign, and it appears that many of the large and influential tribes in the South have espoused his cause and that adherents are flocking to his standard. Altogether the situation in the South is by no means brilliant and signs of this coming trouble have been increasingly apparent since for some inexplicable reason Ould Haj Minnou was appointed Basha of Marakesh last year, presumably on the recommendation of Hafid's French advisers. Minnou is a man of no birth, influence, or attainments, and his nomination to this high post in a city where the local hereditary chiefs have always held all the power was severely criticized at the time, especially as Haj Thami Glawi, the strongest member of all that powerful family, was ousted to make way for him, to the intense irritation not only of the tribesmen but also of the citizens themselves.

Minnou, as might have been expected, failed miserably, and all that his appointment has accomplished has been to estrange the powerful families of that region from the Maghzen, with the result that to-day the situation causes considerable anxiety. Were not the Glawi faction keeping order by force of arms in Marakesh serious events would almost certainly have already occurred, for Minnou's influence is nil. But the Sultan's treatment of the whole Glawi family has not been such as would tempt them to make many sacrifices on his behalf, though up to the present Haj Thami's conduct has been beyond all praise, more especially his continual protection of the lives and property of Europeans.

Bad as is the situation in the South it is little or no better in the North. The feeling of the natives against the French is increasing in hostility and will continue to increase until the French authorities give some clear sign that they have the welfare of the Moorish people at heart. A fresh outburst of opposition to French action has been aroused by the Edict issued by the General commanding the French Army of occupation, in which he fines the city of Fez 1,000,000f. (£40,000) for its share in the late revolt and massacre. The behaviour of the Fez residents, apart from the native soldiers and certain tribal riff-raff, was excellent during those trying days, and many Europeans owe their lives to their agency, and, as far as is known, no real resident of Fez joined the revolt. The whole native population consider this fine brutal, unjust, and impolitic, and they criticize as adversely as the fine itself the fact that the Edict was issued in the name of General Molnier instead of in that of the Sultan. Nor has the fact that this Edict entirely ignored the Treaty rights of foreign protected natives caused a good impression at the European Legations.

I must again refer to the question of certain natives who complain that Frenchmen illegally seized and remain in possession of their lands. Experience has shown that, as the law now stands, it is very difficult for a native to obtain justice against Frenchmen, but the French authorities promise a new code of laws in two years' time. Meanwhile the native has lost his lands—probably for ever. I would once again point out that these cases of landgrabbing have already cost the French Government very dear, and that the natives should now be told that they have no redress until after a period of two years is merely exasperating them. I would now add a word of warning that this exasperation is becoming serious and that there is reason to fear that some incident may occur even here in Tangier long before that date. The French authorities have been constantly warned but nothing would appear to have been done and an ugly spirit is becoming visible which may break out in open action. As at Fez, the outbreak will be anti-French and not anti-European.

The situation throughout the country is so unsatisfactory that the French authorities should realize that the continuation of their apparent policy can only end in a disaster more serious than that which was recently experienced at Fez. It would be futile as well as wrong to disguise the fact that the position of France to-day in Morocco is precarious, and that this unfortunate state of affairs is largely owing to the fact that the French Government, in supporting the despotic Maghzen, has up till now ignored the welfare of the entire Moorish population except in the Shawia. It remains to be seen whether the tragic warning of Fez is sufficient, or whether further deplorable incidents will be required before the French Government can be brought to realize and acknowledge that its policy has been at fault.

Tangier, May 29.

The Edict of General Molnier fining the city of Fez 1,000,000f. on account of the massacre of last month, to which I referred in my telegram yesterday, has been withdrawn. It is officially stated that its publication was premature, but, premature or not, it was published and replied to in most dignified manner by the Fez Moors. Its withdrawal was the only course open to the French authorities, but this ill-advised Edict has left a most unfortunate impression on the minds of the native population. I am authoritatively informed that no fine will be levied.

Large bands of natives are collecting among the tribes east of Fez and the whole country between the capital and the Algerian frontier is up in arms. The Berber tribes to the south of Fez are joining the movement and have already attacked Sefro. It is believed at Fez that an attempt will be made by a great body of tribesmen to obtain possession of the capital. Unrest is increasing all over the interior of Morocco and the situation is becoming critical.

The sentiment appears to be entirely anti-French and not anti-European, and in the Spanish zone, where I have been spending a few days, no anti-Spanish feeling seems to exist except the natural political dislike to foreign intervention of any sort. At Tetuan the greater part of the population look to the approaching occupation of that town by Spain with little more than mild regret that any occupation is necessary, though the tribes south of Tetuan are frankly hostile to Spanish intervention.

Tangier, May 22.

Letters announcing his proclamation as Sultan were received by the native authorities of Marakesh on the 16th instant direct from Sid Muhammad Hiba, the new Pretender, who was at that date still at Tiznit in Sus. These letters bear the Imperial seal and employ all the usual titles of the Sultan. Haj Thami Glawi remains loyal to Mulai Hafid, but looks to immediate French intervention to put down this very serious rebellion. All the other great Kauds appear to be either openly or secretly in relation with Sid Muhammad Hiba, and Haj Thami will not probably be able alone to defend Mulai Hafid's throne in the south for long. His courageous loyalty to Mulai Hafid and to the French is admirable, as the treatment he has received in the past from both has been less than gracious.

Paris, May 22.

The Temps learns from Fez that the unrest among the tribes is spreading to such an extent that military measures on a considerable scale will have to be taken. As operations will have to be conducted in the north, south, and west, the French forces will have to be divided. It is feared that in these circumstances the situation will become extremely difficult unless fresh reinforcements are immediately despatched to Morocco.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES"

Sir,—I do not wish to take up your space unduly. But it is not fair to describe, as your Paris correspondent described the other day, my book on "Morocco in Diplomacy" as a "denunciation of Sir Edward Grey," although, of course, the case it sets forth is hardly likely to be fairly judged in Le Temps. It is a criticism upon the whole policy pursued since 1904 through secret arrangements negotiated by British and French diplomacy, with held from the knowledge of the people of those countries until revealed in Parisian newspapers, to settle the Morocco question outside the Power which had participated in the first International Conference concerning Morocco, which had a Treaty with Morocco, which had large commercial and industrial interests in Morocco, and which had supported Lord Salisbury's policy of the independence and integrity of Morocco, and to settle it in the sense of the destruction both of Moroccan independence and integrity in spite of an international agreement to the contrary. Rightly or wrongly, I believe that the policy thus pursued has served no national interest and has enormously embittered Anglo-German relations, and rightly or wrongly I hold that an improvement in those relations is a cardinal national interest. The case urged is, of course, unpopular, but it has been advanced quite as strongly in France from a similar point of view; for example, in the writings of M. Felicieu Challaye and in the speeches of Baron d'Estournelles de Constant and M. Jaures. It may be wrong or it may be right; but it is not disposed of by abuse and sneers, which is all that has been forthcoming from the critics so far, although I gratefully admit that the review of the book which appeared in the Times was extraordinarily generous.

Your obedient servant,

E. D. MORLEY.

96, Talbot Road, Highgate, N.

Paris, May 23.

A column under General Girardot has been attacked by a native harka close to the Muluya river. The rebels were put to flight, but the French had ten legionaries and one artilleryman wounded.

It is stated that General Lyautey, who arrived at Mekinez yesterday evening, will reach Fez in all probability on Saturday. He will then forward definite advice to the French Government with regard to the despatch of reinforcements.

(REUTERS'S AGENCY.)

Mogador, May 20, via Tangier, Thursday, May 22.

Kaids Gilooly, Zekay, and Zenzmy, in the province of Haha, have adhered to the proclamation of Mai Alnin as Sultan through special envoys.

Kaid Anflus has sent four horsemen secretly with a letter conveying his support to the new Sultan. The tribes in the country surrounding Marakesh are in a state of rebellion and are in sympathy with the movement.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wired from Rome —The Italians after prolonged inaction have resumed offence in Tripoli. Fourteen battalions of infantry and a brigade of cavalry marched out on the 8th instant and seized the oasis of Zanzur. The official Italian despatch describes fierce fighting and the storming of heights with bayonets ending in the defeat of the Turks and capture of the edge of the oasis. No mention is made of losses. General Caneva reports that the battle at Zanzur on the coast, ten miles west of Tripoli, lasted the whole day on Saturday the 8th. The Italian losses were 31 killed and 263 wounded. The captured trenches were full of the dead. The enemy's killed alone are estimated at a thousand, while the number of wounded is enormous.

While the Italians were storming, with bayonet, the heights commanding Zanzur, which were a long threatened position, a large body of Turks made a vigorous attack on the Italian positions at Gargareh. This attack was repulsed with great slaughter by the infantry and the artillery.

In the House of Commons on the 6th instant Sir Edward Grey said that no decision had been reached with regard to the terminus beyond Baghdad. Negotiations between the British and Turkish Governments were still in progress.

Referring to the Hedjaz Railway a Constantinople telegram published in the Cairo Arabic paper Al Fikran states that the Turkish Cabinet have decided to start the construction of the Medina-Mecca section at once. Railway materials are, it is reported, being brought to Medina and the work of construction is now to be commenced. The Arab tribes who live about Medina and are interested in the caravan traffic are reported to be opposing the laying of the line and are threatening to revolt against the Turks. It is rumoured that these tribes have sworn not to allow the railway to reach Medina. Meanwhile, the French engineers and surveyors who have been engaged during the past year or so in making preliminary investigations in connection with the Sana Ebb section of the Yemen Railway have arrived here from Yemen through the Aden Hinterland and have left for Marseilles.

The Times discussing the annual report of the Baghdad Railway, believes that when the question is fully understood the British public will come to the conclusion that it is preferable for us to participate in the construction upon the basis of the strict internationalisation of the Baghdad-Basra section. The important question is the selection of the terminus, and Turkey has declared in favour of Basra, which has Britain's strongest support. Its choice would remove the only serious British objection to the Baghdad Railway scheme, and would, moreover, leave Turkey free to recognise the position of the Sheikh of Koweit as an autonomous ruler under our protection.

The Turkish Commander in Tripoli reports that the recent fighting at Zanzur was desperate. The Turks were compelled to retire in the face of overwhelming odds and lost a hundred killed and three hundred wounded. He asserts that over a thousand Italians were wounded.

It is semi-officially stated in Rome that the Turks lost a thousand killed on Saturday in the fighting at Zanzur.

Plans for the Mediterranean port of the Baghdad Railway at Alexandria have been approved. Work on the branch line to Toprakhale began at Alexandria on 10th instant.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Athens, May 17.

TRAVELLERS arriving at the Piræus from the smaller Aegean islands occupied by the Italians state that in all cases the Turkish authorities have been removed and deported either to Astropalia or Rhodes. At Lero all the Turkish officials and the garrison of 15 gendarmes have been captured and Italian officials installed. A proclamation has been issued stating that the nationality, language and religion of the inhabitants would be respected. Two hundred soldiers have been disembarked who will remain in the island. No opposition was offered and perfect tranquillity prevails.

Several warships, accompanied by transports, appeared off Samos, where the garrison had withdrawn into fortified posts in the interior and prepared to offer a resistance. Nineteen families of Turkish officials at Karpathos have been transferred to Rhodes, where foreigners are not yet allowed to land. The island of Syme is not yet occupied. In the other small islands the local Government has been entrusted to the municipal authorities, who have been sworn in the name of the King of Italy. The Turkish authorities have in all cases been removed, but no troops have been left in the islands. The population of Kalimo made a demonstration, waving Italian and Greek flags.

Rome, May 17.

In a series of telegrams from Rhodes General Ameglio reported to-day that the troops under his command had attacked the Turkish forces remaining in the island, and, after hard fighting, compelled their surrender.

The attack was made at an early hour, the Italians advancing in three columns, two of which had been disembarked the night before in the bays of Mallona and Calamona. These latter troops, supported by the fire of the battleships Ammiraglio di Saint Bon and Regina Margherita, were intended to cut off the enemy's retreat. The main column, commanded by General Ameglio, proceeded directly against the enemy, who were posted on the summit of Mount Psithos. The enemy, to the number of 1,800, gave way after a fierce resistance, leaving 26 killed and 83 wounded, 122 rifles and 200 cases of ammunition.

A later telegram announced that the rest of the Turkish troops had ultimately surrendered and were made prisoners. The Italian losses were insignificant, one officer being wounded and four men killed and 25 wounded.

General Ameglio's despatches were read to the Chamber and Senate by Signor Giolitti and provoked scenes of unbounded enthusiasm.

Vienna, May 19.

The Vienna Stock Exchange was buoyant yesterday on the news of the Turkish capitulation at Rhodes. This mood, paradoxical in a centre so Turkish as the financial circles of Austria, is explained by the hope that the undeniable Italian success may hasten the end of the war by affecting Turkish opinion and thus promote Turkish interests.

The Clerical Reichspost, hitherto Italaphobe, publishes to-day a despatch from its war correspondent at Tripoli stating that a large proportion of the Arabs are growing tired of the war and that hardly a day passes without the arrival of Arab families with their flocks to seek Italian protection. Most of these families come from Gefara and Tahuna, where epidemics and scarcity of food prevail. They are attracted especially by the reports from the Arabs within the Italian lines that they are well treated and are making money. The tribes remaining in the desert, adds the correspondent, seem more fanatical than ever, though their supplies are growing scanty in consequence of the Italian occupation of the Makabaz Peninsula, which compels caravans to make a detour of 25 days' march. The Italians are building a wall four metres high and nine kilometres long round the inner oasis of Tripoli. The wall, which is defended at intervals by blockhouses, is intended not only to enable a small garrison to ward off attacks from the desert, but as a protection from the flying sand.

Rome, May 20.

The report of the fighting round Psithos, the Turkish stronghold on the island of Rhodes, as given by General Ameglio, the commander of the Italian forces, says that having learned of the intentions of the enemy to retire to the mountains, the General decided to surround their position at Psithos in order to cut off all retreat, to prevent them from breaking up into small parties, and to force them to fight a decisive action. He therefore suddenly left the town of Rhodes on the evening of the 15th instant with his forces disposed in three columns.

The main column under the direct command of General Ameglio himself advanced towards Psithos, a 25 miles march which was very fatiguing to the men, owing to the mountainous character of the country. The other two columns proceeded to the Dalayardo and Malona roadsteads, respectively west and east of the Turkish position, where they landed, being supported during the operation by the Italian warships. No difficulty was experienced at any time in the disembarkation, although it was carried out on a moonless night, with lights out, on an open hostile shore. The two columns marched on Psithos, distant about 20 miles from the landing points over the same sort of ground as that traversed by the main body. At 9 o'clock on the morning of the 16th instant tactical communication between the three forces was established, exactly according to arrangement.

The enemy, taken by surprise, endeavoured repeatedly to escape in the direction of Kalopetra, but were repulsed. Being unable to move towards Kalamans and Maritza, where they were exposed to the fire of the warships' guns, they made a counterattack. Threatened by envelopment on their right flank by the Bersaglieri, driven back in front by the Alpine Fusiliers, attacked and overlapped on their left by Fusiliers supported by two mountain batteries, and unable to intrench themselves in the village, which had been destroyed by the concentrated fire of three batteries, the enemy's forces made a gallant resistance. When their position finally became desperate and they saw the battle was lost they dispersed in the direction of Mount Leukopoda, at the foot of which they succeeded in emplacing a mountain battery.

At last the Turks in scattered bodies took refuge in the ravines of Maritza, where General Ameglio intended to attack them the following morning in order to inflict a decisive blow. However, at 11 P.M. the Turks sent in a flag of truce and the General demanded their surrender, which took place under the conditions already reported. The total number of the prisoners was 13 officers, including the Commander-in-Chief, and 950 men. With the prisoners already sent to Italy this accounts for the whole garrison. The Italians also captured six mountain guns with mules and 200 rounds of ammunition and about 700 rifles. Other rifles were collected from the Puthos ravines—Renter.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, May 22.

Italy proceeds with the seizure of islands in the Aegean, and to-day comes news of the occupation of Cos. In the present state of Italian public opinion it is difficult to see where this policy of occupation is to end or in what circumstances the islands will be restored to their rightful owner. The wholesale seizure of these Turkish possessions by Italy seems like a satire upon the thankless efforts which for years the Powers have been making to prevent a violent settlement of the destinies of Crete. Nor can it be denied that the continued occupation of Aegean islands by one of the partners in the Triple Alliance might result in a serious alteration of balance of power in the Near East. Yet no one can assert that Italy in what she has done is transgressing the legitimate scope of warlike operations. There seems to be as yet no Power which will take the responsibility of warning her off the Aegean, as Austria warned her off the western coasts of the Balkans, and so she strikes at the point of least resistance.

Reports regarding the probability of a European Conference to end the war have been current. The Temps points out the radical difference between the situation in 1876, when the Berlin Congress assembled, and the present position of affairs. Then it was a case of revising the terms of a peace that had already been concluded by the Treaty of San Stefano. Now, even if both belligerents consented to enter a conference, the great difficulty would be to decide upon a preliminary basis of peace. In 1878 Germany and Italy did not profess to have any direct political interests in the Near East, and Austria-Hungary was not a Balkan Power to the same extent as now. In the case of all three Powers the situation has since undergone a radical change. Europe has already shown in connection with the Russian suggestions for mediation that she is prepared to play the part of arbitrator, but this manifestation of impartial good will has had no success. Would the task of mediation be any easier if the Powers, including the belligerents, were assembled in conference round a green table? France, as the Temps observes, earnestly desires the restoration of peace, and feels, like the other Powers, that she would then have a liberty of diplomatic action an influence which is now impossible in view of her strict neutrality. At present every one's hands are tied.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 20.

After a long discussion, the Council of Ministers has definitely decided on the expulsion of all Italian subjects in Turkey with the exception of artisans, widows and orphans, and members of religious orders.

The decision of the Cabinet is generally, and probably rightly, ascribed to the effect produced by the capture of the garrison of Rhodes. The untoward event, though anticipated in the best informed military quarters, seems to have surprised the civilian elements which, oblivious of the difference between Rhodes and Tripoli, hoped, with the Tanin, that the Ottoman troops would maintain a protracted resistance in the interior of the island. There is now a tendency to criticize the Government for giving the Italians an opportunity of winning a series of easy victories by its failure to withdraw the garrisons of the islands.

Constantinople, May 21.

An Imperial Iradeh decreeing the expulsion of all Italian subjects who do not leave Turkey within a fortnight has been promulgated this evening. Members of religious orders, widows, orphan children, indigent persons, and workmen employed on the railways and in certain important factories are exempted from the operation of the measure, which, however, affects at least a third of the 50,000 Italian subjects still residing in the Empire. The case of many of these people, especially of the many Jews whose fathers became subjects of the various Italian States before the unification of Italy, is particularly hard. Italian neither by race, language, nor tradition, they regard Turkey as their home and have in some cases rendered considerable service to the Turkish authorities.

While the effects of the measure are likely to be more severely felt at Salomika than here, several of the leading banks, not to mention the Public Debt Administration, are likely to be hard hit by the expulsion of their Italian employees, over a hundred of whom are employed in the Constantinople branches of the Ottoman Bank alone. The adoption of the measure is generally believed to be due to the insistence of the military authorities and Talaat Bey. Supported by certain members of the Committee, they are anxious to convince their countrymen that the efforts of certain prominent members of the Grand Orient of Turkey who formerly belonged to Jewish Lodges affiliated to the Grand Orient of Italy to enlist their sympathies on behalf of their Italian brethren could not shake their uncompromising patriotism.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, May 22.

The first batch of Italians expelled from Smyrna disembarked at Naples to-day to the number of about 400. The Italian newspapers, which have hitherto treated the threat of the wholesale expulsion of their fellow-countrymen with silent disdain, to-night give vent to the general feeling of indignation. It is pointed out that this cowardly measure of reprisal undertaken by the Young Turks is merely a confession of their impotence to meet Italy in the open field. It can only alienate any sympathy with the Turkish cause that may still exist in Europe. As far as Italy is concerned, it is added, its only effect will be to stimulate the country to fresh endeavours and to strengthen its resolution to carry through the war to the end. The pretext offered by the Turkish Government, which attempts to justify the expulsion of thousands of peaceful and industrious Italians by the imprisonment of a few civilian officials from the islands occupied by Italy is manifestly ridiculous. These officials were quite as much military as civil, and there could exist no doubt whatever as to the justification for treating them as prisoners of war.

Constantinople, May 22.

The Council of Ministers to-day decided that Italian subjects resident in Turkey who desire to become Ottoman subjects shall be allowed to do so. The Government will not permit or recognize a change to their former status after the conclusion of hostilities.

Rome, May 23.

According to the Ministerial Tribuna the Government is already taking steps to provide for the Italians expelled from Turkey when they arrive on Italian shores. The Minister of Public Works and the Emigration Commission are concerting measures to find employment and means of livelihood for the fugitives, however numerous they may be.

Chesme (near Smyrna), May 20.

The town of Chesme is somewhat overcrowded with refugees from Turkish families in Chios. Sailing boats with munitions of war continue to leave for Chios at the rate of five or six a week. Two thousand Turkish soldiers have been moved from near Smyrna to Chistak, on the Asiatic coast near Samos. All steamers coming from Smyrna are crowded with Italians now being expelled from the town by order of the Turkish Government. The Marconi station destroyed by the Italian fleet on the occasion of its first visit a month ago has not been reinstalled.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

One of the Temps correspondents with the Turco-Arab forces gives a description of the situation in the neighbourhood of Bu Kemmesh. According to him, the Turks have formed a sort of blockade round the position which, as will be remembered, was occupied by the Italians a few weeks ago. "The Italian journals," the correspondent says, "announced that the road from Bu Gerdan (Tunis) to Tripoli had thus been cut. The facts are that this road has been avoided by the caravans for the last four months or so as it was too close to the shore, and there was always a danger of its being bombarded by the Italian warships. There are in addition to this five or six other roads which are always open to the caravans. Besides, there are enough foodstuffs in the country to last for a long time."

The writer proceeds to describe the disposition of the troops on both sides in detail, and mentions that on the day of writing, 1st May, one of the Italian dirigibles came over Anissa and dropped about a dozen bombs. It was, he says, the market day, and there were a considerable number of cattle and of Arabs. Nevertheless only one person was hit.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 17.

The Tanin says that the Italian occupation of the islands produces neither cold nor heat in Turkey, whose standpoint is in no way modified. It adds: "The Sultan and the entire nation are in favour of the continuation of the war until Tripolitana has been restored to Turkey."

The draft address of the Chamber of Deputies in reply to the Speech from the Throne declares that the reference to the war in the speech—namely, that peace is only possible on the condition that Turkey's sovereign rights are maintained—reflects the national will and public opinion.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

Sofia, May 17.

On Thursday two Turkish soldiers approached the Bulgarian frontier station at Kuru-tepe and fired six shots at a soldier named Christoff, who was repairing the roof of the station building. The man died of his wounds. The soldiers did not return the fire. The Bulgarian authorities have ordered an inquiry into this matter.

May 18.

It is announced here that a body of Turkish soldiers, supported by the neighbouring Pomaks, yesterday attempted to enter Bulgarian territory near the frontier station at Kuru-tepe to remove the body of the Bulgarian soldier Christoff. There was exchange of shots between the Turkish and Bulgarian soldiers, in which one of the former was killed and another wounded. There were no Bulgarian casualties. The Minister of War has instructed the Bulgarian force to abstain from firing, and to avoid any provocative action.

The Pomaks are Bulgarian-speaking Moslems inhabiting the mountainous districts on both sides of the border of Eastern Roumelia and Turkey, to the south of Philippopolis.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, May 22.

Nail Bey, Minister of Finance, has resigned, and his resignation has been accepted by the Council of Ministers. The Cabinet thus loses a very capable and energetic Minister who is universally respected and whose influence has always been exercised on behalf of a moderate policy. It is expected that he will be succeeded by Djavid Bey, the Minister of Commerce.

The causes of the Minister's resignation are unknown. Ill-health doubtless contributed to it, but will not generally be regarded as a sufficient explanation of his unexpected retirement. It may be noted that rumours have been current for the last few days to the effect that Nail Bey and Assim Bey, the Foreign Minister, would shortly resign office and be succeeded by Djavid Bey and Ismail Hakki Babanzade, Djavid Bey's portfolio being taken by Haladjian, of the Ministry of Public Works.

Constantinople, May 29.

The Ministry of Public Works recently invited limited tenders for the construction of irrigation works in Mesopotamia. The works were divided into two groups, the first of which comprises the new Hindieh barrage and protective works against floods of the Euphrates and Tigris, while the second includes the construction of the Feludja barrage, with two systems of canals connected one on the right bank of the Tigris and the other on the left bank of the Euphrates. Two British firms—namely, Messrs. Pearson and Son (Limited), financially supported by the Imperial Ottoman Bank, and Sir John Jackson (Limited), working in combination with the National Bank of Turkey, survived elimination. The former offered to construct the works of the first group in four years for £2,380,000, and the work of the second group for £1,500,000 in five years. Sir John Jackson's tenders were for £2,735,000 and five years, and £1,534,000 and five and a half years respectively. Messrs. Pearson having made reservations in their final tender which were calculated to increase the price and were not in conformity with the conditions imposed by the Government, the commissions responsible for the provisional adjudication rejected their tender, but did not recommend the definite acceptance of Sir John Jackson's offer, considering the price too high.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Perim, May 14.

The Italian warships bombarded Dubab on Monday, but no casualties are reported, the shells having failed to explode. A dhow was stopped to the east of Perim, but on producing papers for Perim was allowed to proceed. The vessel landed provisions at Dubab. The Italians made an effort to seize these by means of a launch, but were driven off by the Turkish fire. The dhow was, however, eventually destroyed by fire from the warships. Another dhow stranded near Dubab on Sunday, and 2,000 rifles and 200 cases of ammunition were seized by Arabs.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

The local press announces that the Ministry of War has placed an order for two aeroplanes with a Bristol company at a cost of £1,300 each. It is also stated that six officers and five engineers will be sent to the makers to study aviation.

The economic effects of the Turco-Italian war are echoed in a recent sartorial failure in Cairo. The unhappy victim, an Italian tailor, has demanded a concordat preventif, on the grounds that his trade has been ruined by the persistent boycott to which he was submitted by his native patrons. There is no truth, however, in the rumour that he has claimed damages from the Turkish Government, in imitation of the spirit of the times.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, May 19.

The reports to the effect that the French Government had authorized the issue of a new loan of £20,000,000 to Turkey are denied. It is stated that so long as the Italo-Turkish war continues, no fresh loans to either of the belligerents will be authorized in France.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 20.

In consequence of a sprained ankle, the result of a fall from his horse last Saturday during military manoeuvres, Mahmud Shevket Pasha, the Minister of War, is confined to his room at the War Department.

News From Turkish Sources.

(Specially translated for the "Comrade")

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

May 9.

THE Agence Ottoman has received the following communications from the Ministry of War.—

Telegram from the Commandant at Tripoli dated 4th May.—"On the night of 3rd May the enemy attacked the ruins of Lehdia at Homs. We too responded with a night attack which lasted until morning. The losses of Italians were heavy and we have captured some material of war and ammunition. A party of our soldiers placed in ambush surprised at dawn a detachment of the enemy and inflicted serious losses, our casualties being only 3 men killed and 12 wounded."

May 10.

We are informed that at the diplomatic reception of last Monday, Assim Bey, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, has protested to the Ambassadors of Great Powers on the subject of the attack by the Italian fleet on non-fortified towns and Red Crescent buildings—a thing which is contrary to the International Conventions signed by Italy herself.

According to the news received by the Minister of War, a force of enemy at Crova comprising 4 battalions of infantry and 2 Matrailleuses attempted to advance southwards on the morning of the 3rd May with the intention of "cutting" the route of caravans. The sudden and fanatical onslaught of the Arabs on the front of the enemy and the attacks of Zouara and Zoavia volunteers forced the Italians to retreat to the refuge of their entrenchments at Crova. The enemy left a great number of dead on the scene of action, while the Arab warriors had 20 killed and as many wounded.

May 11.

We are informed from Cairo that General Edham Pasha, Commandant of the Military Forces at Benghazi, who lately arrived at Cairo to be treated for the ailment he contracted at Benghazi, has not yet completely recovered. Prevented by his indisposition His Excellency has been obliged to postpone his return to Benghazi for a few days.

May 13.

A Council of Ministers was held yesterday in the afternoon under the presidency of His Highness the Grand Vizier. The Council occupied itself with the following questions:—

1. The situation in the Tripolitaine. Mahmud Shevket Pasha, Minister of War, communicated to the Council all the telegrams received from the Tripolitaine. These amply prove that the situation of our combatants is excellent and that they are only waiting for the time when the enemy, who has hitherto always been strictly on the defensive, will come out and fight face to face.

2. The situation in Albania. Talaat Bey, the officiating Minister of the Interior, communicated to the Council a telegram from the Vali of Kossovo saying that the recent incidents have not produced a situation of any gravity. The criminals will be pursued and excitement is subsiding.

All the world is looking forward to the good results of the new reforms which are being introduced.

1 The expulsion of the Italians The Council also occupied itself with the question of the expulsion of the Italians from Constantinople if the Italian fleet continued its activity in the Archipelago.

We are informed that the Council discussed the question of detaining the Italians of the Vilayet of Smyrna as hostages. The Legal Councillor of the Sublime Porte, Rashid Bey, explained some matters to the Council, in connection with this question.

2 The new loan Nail Bey, the Finance Minister, has informed the Council of the details of the new loan contracted by the Government with the Imperial Ottoman Bank. The explanations of Nail Bey were accepted unanimously by the Council.

3 Ministerial responsibility The Council also touched on the question of the power and responsibility of the Ministers which will be a subject of discussion at the next sitting. The Council also discussed several matters connected with national defence and current affairs.

The Situation in Albania.

(FROM THE "TIMES" (CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 21.

No news except that the Lyumia clan has joined the Ipek and Djakova insurgents has been received from Northern Albania, where both sides appear to be mustering their forces before coming to grips. The Constantinople journals now admit that the situation is less favourable than the Government maintained, but they express the hope, which is shared by not a few Albanians, that the outbreak will be localized. A communiqué was issued by the Ministry of the Interior to day repeating the substance of your Salonika Correspondent's account published in the Times of 15th May of the disturbances in the Mirdite country. This account has up till now been described by the inspired Press as false and tendentious.

May 20

Though only one battalion has actually left the capital for Albania, the remainder of the 1st Division has been warned for service in the event of an extension of the insurrection. The Nizam battalions of the 6th (Uskub) and the 7th (Monastir) Army Corps have been brought up to their average strength of 600 by the incorporation of over 20,000 of first reservists from Anatolia during the last six weeks.

Athens, May 20.

Although the dangers which may result from the present troubles in Albania are obvious, there is reason to believe that the Governments of the Great Powers do not as yet regard the situation as critical and they apparently anticipate the early suppression of the movement. In Vienna especially, the apprehensions widely expressed in the Press do not seem to be shared at the Ballplatz. The optimism of the Governments may explain or to some extent excuse the apparently helpless attitude of European diplomacy at the present moment, which seems resigned to let things take their course. Some relief to the anxiety prevailing outside official quarters may be afforded by the circumstance that a truce has been arranged between the Mirdites and the Turkish authorities on the basis that all the concessions granted to the Malissori last year shall be extended to the Mirdites. Whether the promise will be kept time will show, but the experience of the past is not encouraging.

Constantinople, May 21

According to the local journals, 17 Albanians have been killed in a collision with the troops which occurred in the Lania district between Lyumia and Mirdita.

A further official communiqué announces that a general rising need not be apprehended, and ascribes the present disorders to the intrigues of a few Sarrakars. I may note that news from extremely well-informed sources in Macedonia partially confirms the official view that the insurrection may be localized.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Salonika correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung sends to his paper the following telegram—"Thanks to the efforts of the Albanian Ulema the Albanians assembled at Istok have begun to return to their villages. The attempts to raise a revolt among the Mirdites must undoubtedly be put down to the efforts of Montenegrins. Happily the attempts have proved unsuccessful, and the position is decidedly better."

His Uskub colleague writes in a similar strain—"It would seem as if the winter months had been made use of by strong influences beyond the Ottoman frontier for purposes of incitement and for arming the Albanians in such wise as to create fresh difficulties for the Turks in Albania. This time the Albanians can by no means assert that they are revolting in consequence of the attitude and the inactivity of the Government. For now all sorts of public works have been taken in hand, roads are being constructed, foreign engineers are studying various tracks with a view to opening up the country by means of new railways, and a beginning has already been made with the erection of several hundred schools. Should the revolt, as seems likely, spread, the execution of these public works will inevitably come to a standstill and the credits granted for improvements will be swallowed by punitive expeditions. Then the leading men in Constantinople will lose all taste for dealing with these highlanders by diplomatic means. They will soon come round to the view that the expensive journeys of the Sultan, of the Minister of the Interior, Hadji Adil Bey, and of the Governor General of Kosovo, Halil Bey, have all been wasted efforts, and that the large sums which were distributed on those occasions only served the purpose of providing modern arms and ammunition, which are now being used against the Ottoman troops."

The Salonika correspondent of the Temps has had an interview with a high Albanian personage, in the course of which the latter made some valuable remarks. This is how he explained the circumstances of the present unrest—"We are really poor, and the exploitation of our forest riches is impossible owing to the complete absence of means of communication. Throughout the North the population has no other means of livelihood than their cattle, a very meagre source of income, as there is no commerce owing to the difficulties of exchange. Being unable to find any remunerative work wherewith he could satisfy his wants and support his family, the Albanian has contracted other habits, which you no doubt severely condemn, but which nevertheless are natural. Abdul Hamid had an unlimited confidence in his special Albanian Guard, and we abused this confidence perhaps in order to obtain numerous favours. Can we be blamed for that? I think not. The ex-Sultan treated us throughout his reign as spoilt children. This the Albanian people considered, and still consider, as their right. Is it possible to uproot at one stroke this idea in the minds of the Albanians—minds superstitious, simple, and ignorant? Such a process requires time, and it will never be achieved by the force of arms."

"Do you not believe," asked the correspondent, "in the existence of foreign intrigues?" "Which?" inquired the Albanian. "Montenegrins, for instance; for it is undeniable that the programme of the Malissors was drawn up at Cetinje, and to argue from this to the inspiration of Italy seems to me only a matter of logic." "I do not believe in it," replied the Albanian gentleman. "The Albanians will never admit foreign intervention, being too proud of their independence. I am convinced that my compatriots are acting on their own initiative, or rather on the advice of persons in whom they place entire confidence." Among the persons enjoying their confidence, however, there are said to be many Austrian and Italian agents in the disguise of priests and school masters, as well as King Nicholas of Montenegro.

In the course of his further remarks the Albanian said—"The Turks have tried to disarm us, they have burnt down our villages, bastinadoed us before our women and children, they have violated almost all our sacred rights, and undermined the prestige of the husband over his wife (su). The Albanian cannot and would never forget these grave injuries. We demand the right freely to carry arms, freedom from taxation for another few years, the reconstruction of our villages destroyed by the Turks in the course of last year's repression, the construction of roads, railways, schools where the Albanian language should form the basis of instruction, obligatory knowledge of the Albanian language by the officials, and local military service. The Albanians are willing to serve, but only in their own country."

The Macedonian Commission.

As our readers are aware, a Commission has been travelling during the past few months in Macedonia and Albania. The President of this Commission is Hadji Adil Bey, Ottoman Minister of the Interior, and the other members include two civil inspectors, delegates of the Departments of Finance, War, Justice, Public Works, Education and Gendarmerie. Mr. Graves, Financial Adviser to the Ministry of Finance, represents this department in the Commission.

The Commission has full powers to suspect everything, listen to the complaints of the inhabitants, discover their real needs, dismiss officials proved guilty of wrongdoing, introduce on the spot the most immediate measures of reform in the different branches alluded to above, and to draw up plans where the introduction of the reform requires study and time. The Commission, which has already accomplished its mission in the Vilayets of Salonika, Kosovo, and Scutari in Albania, is at the present time in Muhasir. We publish below extracts of an official report, by the President, Hadji Adil Bey, showing the result of the work accomplished by the Commission in the Vilayet of Kosovo.

Guard houses have been established and placed in telephonic communication with each other. The number of shops to be constructed immediately in the Vilayet of Kosovo is as follows:

Four in the Uskub district, 37 in that of Prichtina, 26 in that of Ipek and 37 in the Prizrend district—or a total of 104. The numbers of gendarmes in the Vilayet has been likewise augmented as follows:—300 men have been added to the Prichtina battalion, 150 to that of Ipek and 250 to the Prizrend battalion.

It has been decided to have recourse to armed force in extraordinary cases, such as the pursuit of bands, the repression of revolt, or the protection of road constructions or other enterprises of public utility from the attacks of brigands.

The Governor-General of Kossovo has been authorised to appoint to the Administrative Councils of Prizrend, Ipek and Prichtina members chosen from among the Albanian and Bairaktar chieftains. Four have been appointed in each of these three districts with a monthly salary of 200 piastres.

Among the officials whose bad conduct has been proved the Commission has recalled the Director of the Uskub Prison, guilty of maltreating a prisoner. An inquiry having been opened as regards judicial officials, the Juge d'Instruction of Précheva and a judicial official at Véni-Bazar have likewise been recalled. Measures have been taken as regards certain presidents of Civil Tribunals, and steps have been adopted to ensure the regular working of justice in all these tribunals.

A new regulation has been promulgated in order to put an end to the trade in stolen horses in the districts of Prichtina, Tachlidja, Sénidjé, Ipek and Prizrend.

The high roads from Ipek to Ferizovik, from Scutan to Prizrend and from Mitrovitza to Ipek will be constructed in the course of 1912 by the Ministry of War.

These roads were included among those to be constructed by the Ministry of Public Works, but they have been entrusted to the Ministry of War in order to hasten their construction. The authorities at Kossovo have received the order to construct in part, during the present year, ten main roads and to repair an equal number during the same period.

It has been decided to create agricultural schools and to establish an experimental farm, a dépôt of agricultural machinery and a model institute for the improvement of cattle breeding in the districts of Prichtina, Ipek and Prizrend.

The establishment of these schools, dépôts, etc., and the constructions of the three highways in the above-named districts, will largely contribute towards the improvement of the economic situation and public security in these regions. It has been decided, moreover, to improve the tanning industry, which is so important in Ipek and Prizrend.

An enquiry has been opened in order to determine the number of prisons necessary in the different districts of the Vilayet. As soon as this inquiry has been concluded orders will be given for the construction of these prisons, for which a credit of £120,000 has been opened.

The construction of State konaks at Mitrovitza and Voulchetin has been begun as well as that of other konaks in the seven nahids of the Ipek district. These constructions will be finished in the course of the present year.

It has been decided to establish primary boarding-schools in all the nahids. Among these schools will be some for Serbs and Catholics. The meдресsés, mosques and village schools will be repaired and a large medresé will be constructed at Ferizovik. In order to meet these expenses, a sum of £13,000 has been allocated by the Department of Pious Foundations.

In order to improve the lycées at Uskub, Prizrend, Prichtina, Ipek and Tachlidja, the Commission has decided to raise the grants of these institutions to £100,000, likewise, with a view to modify and reform the preparatory schools at Préchevo, Gailon, Sénidjé, Kalkandelen, Priépoi, Bereketli, Bouzna, etc., it has been decided to bring their grants up to £57,600; and, finally, with a view to opening 82 primary schools in the different districts of the Vilayet of Kossovo, the total has been made up to £469,800. Other sums having been likewise devoted to expenses under this heading, the budget for education in Kossovo has been drawn up as follows:—

Salaries	£469,800
Permanent expenditure	229,000
Constructions and repairs	268,000
Total	£966,800

A sum of £23,200 has also been set aside from the extraordinary Budget of this year for the construction and repairs of one school at Mitrovitza, eight primary boarding-schools in the district of Ipek (of which 5 are for Serbs and Catholics), one at Louma, and one at Prizrend.

A study of the reforms of the collection of tithes and other taxes according to local requirements is being made by Mr. Graves, a member of the Commission, who has already drawn up a Bill, submitted to Parliament, and relating to the modifications to be introduced in the existing system of the collection of tithes.—The Near East

The Italians in Tripoli.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR,—Since the Turkish Government have taken the statesman-like and commendable step of reopening the Dardanelles to navigation the Italian Press appears to have been roused to the highest pitch of indignation. The neutrals are abused and England, as one of them most severely hit as a result of the unhappy Tripoli venture, has come in for a good deal of adverse comment. Frankness is always praiseworthy, and we should rejoice to see that the Italians are showing themselves in their true colours. The pen is mightier than the sword, and it is with leaflets printed in Arabic and Berber that the Italians fight for the land promised to their starving population of the south. In those leaflets also, dropped over the Arab camps from aeroplanes, we see the true state of their feeling towards this country. They were mentioned in the Times of March 27th, but for some unknown reason the matter was never again alluded to. Strictly speaking, we expected at least a leading article from the Times on such an important matter. In those pamphlets the Italian general told the Arabs that he came to Tripoli as an agent of the great, glorious and rich Italy in order to save them from the threatened invasion of thousands of Englishmen and Frenchmen who wanted to take their land and their work because they were starving at home! I trust the Arabs know better, but their friends here hoped the statements would meet with more publicity. There is also another class of pamphlets circulated by the Italians. A copy of one is to be seen at the Foreign Office, but they are reluctant to send them to this country. I understand, however, that they are spread broadcast in Italy and in Russia. In them can be seen photographs, obviously faked, of "Arab atrocities" on live Italian soldiers, and I am not surprised that when asked for a copy the Italian Embassy refers one to Rome.—I am, Sir, yours obediently.

GEORGE RAFFALOVICH.

Junior Conservative Club,

May 18, 1912

Agonies Caused by the Camel's Roll.

BY ALAN OSTLER.

The big Soudan bred male camel of the Zoological Gardens has assisted at an interesting experiment, or, rather, he furnished the aim of the operation, submitting with an air of supercilious meekness to the trying on of a newly devised stretcher which is to be used by the British Red Crescent Mission in Tripoli for the benefit of Arab and Turkish sick and wounded.

It is a weary journey from the fighting line to the little British hospital at Ghanen. The nearest Turkish camp is at least a full day's camel journey from the hospital, and many of the outposts are as far away again.

Half of the journey lies over scorching desert sands, half up the face of almost inaccessible mountains. For a sick or wounded man, unable to sit a horse, there is no means of transit possible save the pack camel, and of the miseries of such a journey I am able to speak from firsthand experience.

The walking gait of a camel is peculiar. Unlike a horse, or dog, or any other quadruped, so far as I know, he does not move his near forefoot and off hindfoot simultaneously, but strides first with both off limbs and then with both near ones. This primitive method of progression, as though his mechanism consisted of two parallel sections, gives him his peculiar rolling gait, and makes him an uncomfortable beast to ride upon, even for a man in perfect health. To a sick man, camel-riding is a racking torture.

The trains of Turkish sick and wounded on their way to hospital are a most pitiful sight. By way of mitigating the discomfort, the Arabs spread sacks, and, when possible, mattresses, on the broad pack-saddles. But many of the sick men are too feeble to hold themselves in place even thus, and so a "rahk" (companion rider) sits behind them, holding them in place with arms clasped about their middles.

Thus, again and again I have seen men arrive in a state of collapse, their heads rolling on their shoulders, their lips parched, their eyes set in their heads; half dead from wounds or sickness and almost wholly so from exposure to the burning sun or bitter wind and from the ceaseless motion.

It was these considerations which made Captain Dixon Johnson, manager of the British Red Crescent expedition to Tripoli, decide to obtain, if possible, some kind of stretcher in which men could be carried or camel-back without suffering from jolting or from from exposure. After considerable investigation and experiment, he has succeeded in getting what promises to be the very thing; and this was tested on one of the Zoo camels.

It is a wooden pack-saddle, to which are fixed folding metal arms or brackets. These brackets support two stretchers, one at each side, to which, head, foot and outer side rails are fixed, giving it the appearance of a baby's cot. A green rot-proof canvas awning goes over the top, shielding the patient from the glare of the sun or from rain.

From the experiments carried out in the Zoological Gardens—the camel, by-the-by, behaved beautifully—I am sure that this device will answer splendidly. There was at first some difficulty, because the Zoo camel, being well fed and little worked, has acquired an enormous hump.

Then the camel refused to kneel. He replied to all entreaties that it has pleased Allah to place him in a country full of luscious buns, where loads (such as babies) are lifted to the backs of camels in a reverent manner.

It was written that he should no more kneel in the dust; and kneel he didn't.

However, the saddle was fitted on his huge back, and it was found to carry the stretcher splendidly. There was hardly any jolting as the beast minced slowly up and down.

I only hope that plenty of these stretchers will be sent to the relief of the Turkish sick and wounded, who need them so. That, of course, depends on the money sent to Coutts' Bank by sympathisers with the Red Crescent Mission.—The Daily Express.

The Economic Condition of Italy.

It appears to be beyond doubt that Italy is suffering severely in an economic sense from the effects of the war with Turkey. The military results which she has so far achieved in Tripoli are moreover of small value, and Italian prestige has been lowered by the events of the past eight months. In the early days of the struggle it was assumed that the conquest of the Turkish colony would be accomplished with rapidity and comparative ease, but the problem of subduing the Arab tribesmen yet remains unsolved while Italy's proceedings in the Aegean Sea may lead to intervention on the part of the Powers, and to the humiliation of the apostles of Italian Imperialism. In the meantime, the internal condition of the country is far from satisfactory. An Italian correspondent of the Economist depicts the situation in very sombre hues. Great depression, he affirms, prevails in Italian trade. The Houses have been suffering from panic, and Italian Three and a Half per cents, which stood at 103 before the commencement of the war, have fallen to 93. The issue of 250 million lire of Treasury Bills at 4 per cent has naturally had an adverse effect on Government stocks, and the authority cited expresses the belief that but for the drain on the Treasury surpluses due to the war it would not have been necessary to raise such a large sum at a moment so unfavourable to the public credit. That the year 1911 resulted in heavy losses to the staple industries of Italy is evidenced by the reports presented at the meetings of various industrial companies. The cotton trade suffered severely. The closing of the Levantine markets, according to the correspondent, was grievously felt both by spinners and weavers, and many important mills were compelled to discharge a large number of their hands. Wheat, meanwhile has reached famine prices, and the fact is recalled that in 1898 when the quotation had scarcely reached the present level, the Government under the pressure of popular troubles were constrained to suspend the onerous import duty on this necessary of life. The writer is convinced that new and burdensome taxes are in store for the already overtaxed Italian people, and he expresses the hope that as the outcome of their sufferings they will learn the lesson of the folly of war. What the conflict has cost no one except the Government appears to know. It is estimated by the correspondent of the Economist, however, that the first seven months involved an expenditure of £50,000,000, although the Ministry professed to have expended no more than the £8,600,000 voted by Parliament. But a Government cannot conceal its financial operations indefinitely, and the truth must be disclosed in the near future. The Italian people, who were led to believe that Tripoli was a new Eldorado, have been sadly deceived, and it is to be feared that their disillusionment is not yet complete. Instead of increasing the importance of Italy among the European Powers, her latest African adventure is likely to involve her in further political and economic difficulties at home and loss of prestige abroad.—The Statesman.

Turkey and the Dardanelles.

With the landing of Italian forces at Rhodes the war has taken another turn, which, for the present at any rate, is less serious than that which it succeeds. There is still but little ground for congratulation in the general position of affairs, but we have, at least the satisfaction of knowing that the immediate difficulty as to the Dardanelles is at an end. Weather has, unfortunately, delayed the clearing of a passage through the Straits, but we may be confident that the wise and courageous resolution taken by the Turkish Government will be carried out with all the promptness possible. Turkey has shown a consideration for neutral interests which deserves full acknowledgment from the Powers involved—most of all from Great Britain, which is pre-eminently concerned in the maintenance of unchecked ingress and egress for the trade of the Black Sea. The loss to English trade by a temporary closure must at all times be great; and circumstances are conceivable—for example, the failure of crops in other countries than Russia from which we draw food supplies—in which such a measure would be a national calamity. So much, moreover, are all parts of the world to-day bound together that there is no saying what may be the repercussions of such a measure as the closing of the Dardanelles. A shot fired at a belligerent may do him little harm; it ricochets, and seriously injures several neutrals. So long as the Black Sea was entirely enclosed within Turkish territory the situation was fairly clear. It was a mare clausum, much the same as is the Dead Sea. The situation changed when Russia acquired territory along the northern shores. It was still further changed by the new position of Bulgaria and Rumania. There was another modification by reason of the improvements in the navigation of the Danube, giving access to the Black Sea on the part of vessels coming from or going to inland ports. These changes have been recognized in a series of well-known international agreements. By the Treaty of Adrianople, signed by Turkey in one of her hours of humiliation, she admitted the right of merchant vessels to navigate the Black Sea and the Dardanelles. The Treaty of Paris, while declaring the Black Sea "neutralized," added that its ports and waters were to be open to the mercantile marine of all nations. The stipulation as to merchant vessels was reiterated in the Treaty of London of 1871; and this arrangement was recognized by the Treaty of Berlin in 1878. Treaties apart, the Black Sea may to-day be said to be a continuation of the Mediterranean; and, if it be so viewed, the right of all nations to trade therein admits of no question. Taking existing treaties into account, the general right to make use of the only passage into a portion of the open sea is also unquestioned, subject to Turkey's conventional rights in regard to the passage of ships of war. But when the matter is looked at from the point of view of Turkey as a belligerent the question proves to be somewhat more complex and to have more sides to it than diplomacy in 1856, 1871 and 1878 contemplated.

Every nation, certainly every sea Power, has made large claims of sovereignty over parts of the sea adjacent to the shores of its territory. Venice, Genoa, Denmark, Norway, Russia, and, not least, England, have put forward pretensions as to territorial seas, "narrow seas," "King's chambers," which other States have declined to recognize. The course of things has been, on the whole, adverse to such claims. It has been just the contrary of what has taken place on land. There the movement has been for centuries all in favour of creating individual ownership or, where that does not exist, national ownership, and there are now few parts of the earth which are no man's land. There is scarcely a rock, the home only of sea birds and crustaceans, upon which some flag, the symbol of national possession, has not been hoisted. On the ocean an opposite policy has prevailed and is likely to continue. In the contest which was waged some three hundred years ago between Grotius and Selden, victory has been, on the whole, with the former. Everywhere the tendency is in favour of the policy of the open sea, and even as to territorial waters there is a disposition to admit certain rights in other nations than the littoral States. Modern jurists have devised familiar formulae to express and define this tendency, and it has been laid down by eminent authorities that straits serving as passages from one free sea to another free sea may never be closed.

But the present situation reminds one that any general rules on this subject may have to be read in the light of special circumstances, such circumstances for example, as Turkey may fairly urge exist in her case. The independence of a nation is worth little if it must forego some of its most effective belligerent rights and may not protect by all means at its disposal its vital parts. If it may not effectually defend its capital and the seat of the administration, it is at the mercy of any adversary. Lord Morley's remarks upon this point are unanswerable. Without a fleet able to cope with the navies of other nations, Turkey must put her trust in forts and mines. The latter are necessarily dangerous to neutral shipping; modern mines, it has been proved, may destroy any vessel; if they are to be a real deterrent to a hostile fleet, they must bar the passage of merchant vessels. They are the natural weapons of States devoid of maritime strength. In any future arrangement likely to be lasting these facts must be recognized; for it cannot be expected that Turkey will refrain from using the readiest and cheapest means of defence if her enemies are free to attack or threaten her at her most vulnerable point. Such problems as these grow more important every day, as international law gathers strength and form, and we shall await with interest the publication of the correspondence which has, no doubt, passed in the last two or three weeks.

—The Times.

بابت ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ ع

موسم بہار کا دورہ گریساں میں ایک
می ہار ہوتا ہے۔ لیکن ہمارے
ماہواری جدید ضمیمہ سال بہر میں
بارہ مرتبہ غائع مکر اپنا گشت لگاتے
ہیں۔ چنانچہ حسب معمول قازہ
بناڑہ ضمیمہ بابت ماہ جون سنہ
۱۹۱۲ ع بغرض ضیافت طبع غائقین
گراموٹوں پیش کیا جاتا ہے۔ اور
واضح رہے کہ یہ سال حال کی اخیر
عشامی کے اعلیٰ ترین رکارڈوں کا
نچوڑ میں جنہیں ذیل کے مشہور اور
مقبول گانے والوں نے عجیب و غریب
الہاز کیساتھ تیار کیا ہے۔ یعنی درطرحہ
رکارڈ - ۱۰ - انچ والے جن میں چھ
چھ اور منتخب گانے ہیں - ۶ -
گوئیوں کے گانے ہیں۔ قیمت نی
رکارڈ تین روپیہ۔ ان کے علاوہ اور
گانے بھی اسٹاک میں موجود ہیں۔

(۱) (محمد حسین ماسٹر اف
مارمولیم) گون ہے جو اس سے واقف
ہیں! یہ اپنے طرز کا ایک ہی گانے
والا ہے جیسا کہ لاجواب گانے ویسائی
مارمولیم بھی بجاتا ہے۔ اس کے
رکارڈوں کی بہت مالک ہے۔

(۲) (موج الہی) یہ وہی پرونیمر
موج الہی ہیں جن کو فن موسیقی میں
کمال حاصل ہے ان کے گانے کی انسان
داد نہیں دے سکتا۔

(۳) (پہارا صاحب) ان کا کلا تمام
اطراف ہندوستان میں مقبول ہے۔

(۴) (سہراب جی) الغریب کمپنی
کے سہراب جی ایک نامور ایکو ہیں۔

جن سے بچہ بچہ واقف ہے ان کے گانے
میں فطرت کی لے داری اور ہلکی
ہیرنی ہوتی ہے۔ اور سہراب مزاق
تو ان پر قول مار گیا ہے۔

(۵) (سہراب جی و بہنو) یہ رکارڈ
اچھوتی الہاز سے سہراب جی و بہنو
نے بنایا ہے۔ مزاقیہ حاضر جوابی

اور موزوں پہتیاں سننے میں کے قابل ہیں۔

(۶) (العلیم حسین لکھنوی) شبانی
الذیا بہر میں ان سے بہتر کوئی نہیں بجا
سکتا اور کمال یہ ہے کہ بختی ولس ایما معلوم

ہوئے کہ کوئی خوش الحان کوئی کارہائے۔

الم۔۔۔۔۔

دی گریموٹوں کمپنی لمیٹڈ۔
پوسٹ بکس نمبر ۸۸ کلکتہ

TO LET.

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh,
B.A., LL.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry
a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"
29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta.

Ladies' Veil

(Burqa).

Latest invention, quite up-to-date.

Best Purdah Keeper.

Most comfortable and easy wear

SEVERAL AWARDS.

APPROVED BY

H. H. The Begum Sahiba of Bhopal.

Can be had for Rs. 10

FROM THE

Khatoon Stores, Delhi.

مندوستانیوں سے زیادہ یورپیوں
اقوام صنعت و حرفت کی قدر کر رہی
ہیں خاتون اسٹور دہلی کی دستکاریوں
و ننہیں آرائشی سامان سے انکے کمرے
سجائے جاتے ہیں۔ حنفیہ اسکر متعدد
العام طلائی و نقرئی تمغہ مل چکے
ہیں۔

زائدہ اہتمام ہیں۔

خواتین د الہ بچو انکے خوشنما و
آرام دہ لباس و دیگر ضروریات خانہ۔
داری تیار ہو کر مناسب قیمت
پر فروخت کی جاتی ہیں۔

29-6-12

The Regular Homoeopathic College,

118-2, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta.

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopath, Dr. R. C. Nag, M.D., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica," Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, for teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years. (H) L. M., S. & (H)
M.B. titles. Most regular lectures. The Staff most experienced and efficient and includes
Dr. Younan and I. M. Mallick. Best lectures in "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class. Dissection arranged. Evening Classes. A few free Student-ships for deserving Mohammedan students.
Rooms fitted with electric lights and fans. "Lectures begin on the 17th June." Apply to the SUPERINTENDENT at 43, Cornwallis Street
Calcutta. 22-6-12.

WANTED

CANVASSERS

Apply for terms to:—MANAGER,

"The Comrade,"

109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN
TYPOGRAPHICAL
DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
+ CALCUTTA +

In Aid of The Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman
of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

Nos. { 9-12524.

{ 9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of
The Gramophone Company,
Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world
and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A. :-
"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth."

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Houtsma, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopaedia of Islam :- "Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstol :- "The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews :- "Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the
'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and
Rs. 4-8 or 6s for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,
REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Quadian, Punjab.

5-10-12.

DO YOU WANT TO EARN RS. 3 A DAY — ?

Making Hosiery on Durbar Auto-knitters, work easy and interesting and finished in spare time. No Experience necessary. Distance immaterial. Reliable persons kept well employed with regular work by Hosiery Manufacturers.

WE SHOW YOU HOW

to work the machine—to make the Hosiery. You then supply us with your work done at Home, for which we pay you specified wages.

CAN YOU FIND A BETTER PROPOSITION ?

What Others Say.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for Prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,
Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by / Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 25. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, June 22, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1.

CONTENTS

PAGE.	PAGE
THE WEEK ... 549	PERSIA—
TELE A TELE—	News of the Week ... 556
The Maharaja of Durbhanga at Aligarh ... 551	The Helplessness of Persia ... 556
The New Judge for the High Court of Allahabad ... 551	The Railway to India ... 557
Mr. Montagu's Recantation ... 551	ANECDOTAGE ... 557
A High Court for Behar ... 551	MOROCCO—
An Indian Muhammadan War Correspondent ... 552	News by the English Mail ... 558
The Islamia High School of Etawa ... 552	The Revolt in Morocco ... 559
Al-Nihal ... 552	The Situation in Morocco ... 560
Turkish Relief Fund ... 553	THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
TURKISH RELIEF FUND ... 553	News of the Week ... 561
MISCELLANEOUS TURKISH RELIEF FUND COLLECTIONS ... 553	News by the English Mail ... 561
LEADING ARTICLES—	News from Turkish Sources ... 562
Some War Publications ... 553	The Expulsion of Italians ... 561
Islam in Russia ... 555	The Situation in Albania ... 564
	The Kemour Conference ... 565
	The Sultan in Prison ... 567
	The Emancipation of Turkish Women ... 568
	Aviation in Turkey ... 568
	Ottoman Finance ... 569
	The Closing of the Dardanelles ... 569
	ADVERTISEMENTS ... 570-572

The Week.

The India Bill.

LORD CREWE in moving the second reading of the Government of India Bill in the House of Lords said that after the exhaustive debates of the 21st and 22nd of February, further discussion was unnecessary. Though doubtless the English in Calcutta and Muhammadans in Dacca still objected, there were no signs of wavering in the general acceptance of the Bill in India. There were even gratifying signs of a tendency on the part of some of the original opponents towards acceptance, as indicated by the desire to make the best of it and obtain such concessions as they believed could be granted.

Lord Curzon complained that the House had been led to believe that their assent would be asked not merely to the technical details embraced in the Bill but to the whole policy of Government. He believed that such was the Government's original intention, and he had heard that the Bill as originally drafted was a much larger concern. Government's procedure would stand out in history as one of the most unconstitutional ever followed in regard to the Government of India. He ridiculed Lord Crewe's statement as to the degree of acceptance which Government's policy had obtained in India. The mass of the people knew nothing and of the rest the vast majority were absolutely indifferent. As regards those who realised its significance, he believed that the state of affairs was entirely different from Lord Crewe's description. Lord Curzon dealt in detail with the immense expenditure involved, which would hang like a millstone round the neck of the Indian taxpayer for years to come. The least that the Government of India could have done was to economise. Why not have stayed in Calcutta for the next few years while New Delhi was being built instead of spending money on a temporary capital? The system of fancy surpluses with which it was proposed to meet the cost, involving diversion of funds required for irrigation and railways, was thoroughly bad and injurious to India. Lord Curzon said he was glad to learn that the opinion of the experts favoured the site to the southward of Delhi but that too meant further expenditure on defence, and who would benefit apart from the members of Government and administrative personnel?

Lord Minto fully endorsed Lord Curzon's remarks. He was still in the closest touch with Indian opinion, both European and native, and doubts as to the wisdom of the changes were daily increasing. All that could be done now, however, was loyally to support them.

Lord MacDonnell's only criticism of the Bill was the way in which it withdrew from the House opportunity of discussing whether an Executive Council for Behar should be created.

Lord Crewe replying insisted that the Government's policy as a whole continued to find favour in India. Answering an enquiry by Lord Curzon, he said that Barrackpore would remain the extra residence of the Governor of Bengal. He had heard nothing of its becoming a prey to the cheap tripper and hoped it would not. As regards the contents of Government House, the most friendly arrangements for their disposal had been concluded between the Viceroy and Lord Carmichael.

Government House would not be altogether emptied and turned into barracks.

The final selection of the Delhi site had been deferred to enable the experts to see Delhi immediately after the rains, but it would doubtless be to the southward of Durbar Camp. The financial methods proposed, said his Lordship, were the most sensible and the most feasible of any.

Lord Lansdowne asked, "Was it wise to ask Their Majesties to lay the foundation till they knew whether the site was suitable?" In calling attention to the financial and other points which had been raised they had fulfilled their duty, and they would be glad if their misgivings proved to be exaggerated and the changes conducted to the wellbeing of the people.

Lord Crewe in closing the debate said it was quite clear to everyone including the King that it was uncertain and even improbable that the place where the stone was laid would be the actual site of Government building, but there was little reason to doubt that it would form part of the New Capital.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Triple Entente.

SPEAKING in the French Chamber on the foreign estimates, M. Poincaré said relations with Germany were loyal, courteous and correct. Relations with Russia and Britain had never been better. The alliance with Russia and the entente with Britain had found their application throughout the globe and had everywhere contributed to the maintenance of peace. Referring to the recent newspaper discussion of the suggestion of an alliance with Britain, M. Poincaré said that the entente, though unwritten, had the support of the majority of both peoples. The triple entente had similarly contributed to the maintenance of peace in Europe, without interfering with anyone. His speech was punctuated with cheers.

Home Rule.

THE House of Commons has resumed the discussion of Mr. Agar-Robartes' amendment to the Home Rule Bill for returning four Ulster counties to the United Kingdom.

Sir E. Carson said that even if the amendment were carried, Ulster would persist in its opposition to Home Rule. Mr. Redmond said that the amendment was purely a wrecking one. Mr. Lloyd-George said that if Ulster appealed for separate treatment, the Government would seriously consider the appeal, but such a demand had not even been made during the debate. The discussion was adjourned.

Mr. Balfour made his first public speech since his retirement from the leadership of the party. Addressing five thousand people at an anti-Home Rule demonstration at Preston, he said, the Home Rule Bill seemed the worst of the three. It was a compilation of all the worst features of every free constitution in the world and defied all the teachings of history. The moonstruck legislators were robbing even federalism of its blessings.

Mr. Long and Lord Curzon were the chief speakers at a great anti-Home Rule demonstration in the Albert Hall which was attended by delegates from the whole Kingdom, including strong contingents of Ulstermen and Protestants from the south of Ireland. The most fervent enthusiasm was displayed.

Sir E. Carson was the chief speaker at the Anti-Home Rule demonstration. He said Ulster was determined that Home Rule even if passed, should become dead as an Act of Parliament. She accepted the Government's declaration of war. "We are not altogether unprepared," he added, "and now is the time to take a step forward in the campaign."

Afghanistan.

News from Khost is to the effect that Brigadier-General Abdul Aziz has reached Chakmanni with two regular regiments and has summoned the Mangal Jirgah in order to discuss the terms of settlement.

The Safi Mullah is said now to be in Khost together with other mullahs, and they are preaching from texts that the common people should be able to understand, it seems the object being to bring the rebellious tribesmen into a proper frame of mind. It is stated as doubtful whether any permanent effect will be produced.

Jahanabad (Jandad) Khan Ghulzai, the chief from Khost who recently took refuge in India, is now on a visit to Simla, presumably to endeavour to persuade the Government of India to intervene on behalf of his two sons who have been arrested in Kabul by the Amir.

Jandad Khan is a man of strong character and independent views and consequently wields considerable influence on the border. He has at least one son still in the Khost country. The part he has taken in the recent rising is not very clear, and it is not yet known whether he will be included in the terms which General Abdul Aziz is arranging on behalf of the Afghan Government with the tribesmen upon the spot.

The Pioneer says it is reported that the Amir has had notice conveyed to Jahanabad Khan that he must return to Afghanistan within a month or that his sons in Kabul will be kept under arrest and his property will be confiscated. Jahanabad Khan saw a fortnight ago that the resistance of tribesmen to the Afghan regular forces was a half-hearted one and he wisely betook himself to the shelter of British territory. Whether he will elect to return to Afghanistan is a matter for his own consideration. He would probably be safe in the Ghulzai country, but he is a man of means and he may incline to stay in India and resume his old trade connections, for he has long been intimately concerned with the "Powindah caravan traffic."

China.

REUTERS' AGENCY learns that nothing is known confirmatory of the statement that Russia and Japan are not likely to participate in the sixty million loan. Many difficulties are confronting the bankers. Further conference, which, it was hoped, would be the last, was to be held in Paris on the 15th. The Russo-Japanese proposals which were left unsettled at the London conference are not calculated to render future negotiations very difficult. They had reference to technical building details and there has since been constant interchange of communications between London, Tokio and St. Petersburg. Further meetings were held in London on the 7th and the 8th instant, at which further approach to the agreement was made. The parties are now so close together that it was expected that details would be arranged at the conference of the 15th.

The Times says that the Chinese Loan Conference which was arranged to be held in Paris on Saturday has been postponed. The Daily Telegraph says that a hitch has occurred.

Reuter wires from Peking.—Tang Sha Oyi, the Prime Minister, has fled to Tientsin. Yuan Shi-Kai has twice sent his Secretary to him, but Tang-Sha Oyi refuses to return. He says he wants to resign.

The Cabinet has appealed to the international financial group and has obtained an advance of three million taels to satisfy clamorous troops.

Gun-running.

THE French Press, commenting on the notification issued by the Sultan of Muscat ordering the establishment of a storage warehouse for all arms, points out that France is directly interested in the arms trade and that Jibuti is largely dependent thereon. It is considered certain that the Government will only obtain the approval of the Chambers to the surrender of French treaty rights if they are able to point to compensation.

Behar High Court.

With reference to the question of establishing a High Court at Patna for the new province of Behar and Orissa, the Government of India have addressed the Local Government asking them to look into the matter with a view to ascertaining matured opinion on the subject.

The Pioneer says the statement in the Ranchi telegram that the Government of India has informed the Government of Behar and Orissa that they consider a High Court should be established at Patna is not exactly correct. The reference draws attention to the suggestion that such a Court should be formed and asks the Local Government for its matured opinion on the subject.

At an extraordinary meeting of the Patna Bar Association, held recently, a resolution was passed thanking Government for the steps taken for the establishment of a High Court at Patna.

New Allahabad Judge.

A PRESS COMMUNIQUE in the Home Department states that His Majesty the King-Emperor has approved the appointment of Mr. Muhammad Rafiq to be a Puisne Judge of the High Court at Allahabad.

Indian Public Services.

THE Times states that the Government has decided to appoint a Royal Commission to enquire with regard to the public services in India generally, but no statement can yet be made as to its composition or the terms of reference.

The Royal Commission on India Services will, it is presumed, enquire among other things into the present block in the Civil Service, which is particularly marked in the United Provinces and the Punjab.

New Delhi.

ARRANGEMENTS for the new capital are proceeding steadily, and now that the site has been finally selected, the necessary engineering staff will be collected for employment on the permanent capital. The experts have sketched out the general outline of the new city, and possibly the Engineering Staff will be secured to commence the works by the middle of the rains. Major H. C. Benson, Deputy Commissioner, Delhi, is making a visit to Simla in connection with the arrangements for the new capital. The Punjab Government have asked the Delhi Municipality to secure the services of an expert Sanitary Officer belonging to the Indian Medical Service so that measures for sanitary improvements may be taken up in hand before the Government of India assemble there in the beginning of the winter and the rush of the cold weather visitors.

Oriental Studies.

THE Government of India have awarded the two State scholarships available in 1912 for the scientific study of Arabic and Sanskrit in Europe to Mr. Abdus Sattar Siddiqui of the Aligarh College, and Pandit Tarachand of the Punjab, respectively.

Arabic College.

HIS HIGHNESS THE AGA KHAN always laid stress upon the importance of the study of the Arabic language, so that hidden treasures of ancient literature may be laid bare. At present there is no Arabic School worthy of the name in Bombay Presidency where old literature can be studied in the true spirit. Haji Abul Hasan has now promised Rs. 75,000 to found an Arabic College in Bombay in honour of the visit of this Piri Sahib of Bagdad.

TETE À TETE

The very cordial and enthusiastic reception accorded to the Maharaja of Durbhanga on the occasion of his recent visit to Aligarh will, we hope, lead to the growth of cordiality and fellowship in Hindu Moslem relations. So much is being said, and to so little purpose, about racial identity or cleavage in this country that one is almost afraid of touching the question at all lest one should find one self in the atmosphere of cant and bombast. The way of looking at the matters that are supposed to be keeping the Hindus and the Mussalman apart has grown conventional. It must, we are perfectly sure, have sometimes occurred even to the most thoroughgoing advocate of separatism in either camp that Providence did not create the Hindus and the Mussalmans with the sole purpose of thwarting each other in their desire to live. The nature of the political antagonism with which we are face to face to-day is only half understood, though its consequences cannot be mistaken. Public life in this country is but another name for tactics. When entire communities have been organised, not with a view to securing the greatest good for all, but to keep the rivals out of their legitimate share, it may not be easy to deny that the standard of public life in this country is not of the highest. Misunderstandings have swung the whole purpose of Indian politics out of focus. Mutual recriminations can hardly restore sanity and balance to the stock conceptions of public duty. Though the two communities exist side by side, their ignorance of each other is growing to be phenomenal. Mutual knowledge, and sympathy that springs from knowledge, should precede political co-operation. Social rapprochement is, therefore, the master key to the Hindu-Moslem situation. The great educational movements for the Moslem and the Hindu Universities that embody the highest intellectual and moral aspirations of the two communities have evoked a spirit of mutual goodwill which is full of happy augury for the future. The speeches recently delivered at Aligarh in welcoming the Maharaja of Durbhanga clearly indicate the significance that had been attached to his visit. The sentiments to which the Maharaja gave expression were quite worthy of the occasion. He must have carried away memories of a hearty welcome, accorded to him with equal warmth by the students, the staff, and the trustees, which will prove of abiding value. It is pleasant to record in this connection that Mr. Mohindra Pratap Singh, an Old Boy of the Aligarh College, has sent Rs. 500 as his donation to the Moslem University Fund, expressing gratification at the reception given to the Maharaja and hoping that it would lead to the growth of union and goodwill between the two communities. The value of these acts of sympathy can hardly be over-estimated. They draw the ties of fellowship closer and with greater sureness than any formal conference of communal delegates charged with the mission of negotiating a treaty of peace—on paper.

The Maharaja of Durbhanga at Aligarh.

The announcement that the Hon. Mr. Mohamed Rafiq, Additional Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, will succeed the Hon. Mr. Justice Syed Karamat Husain as Judge of the Allahabad High Court has been received with unalloyed satisfaction throughout the country. The entire Press of the United Provinces in particular has hailed the appointment in terms of deep appreciation; and we cannot but congratulate the Government on having made a choice which has been acclaimed with striking unanimity by the people. The Hon. Mr. Rafiq has already made his mark as a distinguished judicial officer in his province. He enjoys a well-deserved reputation for ability, independence and strength of character. We are sure his career on the bench of the Allahabad High Court will be one of distinction. Now that the Hon. Mr. Rafiq has reached the summit of his judicial career, he will recall with particular pleasure a prophecy associated with its commencement. Just after his appointment as Judge of the Small Cause Court, Lucknow, the late Sir Auckland Colvin, then Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, visited Aligarh, and, while speaking of the good work the "Aligarh Boys" were doing as public servants, referred to Mr. Mohamed Rafiq, a distinguished Old Boy of the College, and confidently predicted his future appointment as Judge of the High Court. Sir Auckland Colvin had perceived in the young Barrister the promise of a future Judge. We are glad the promise of early manhood has in this case ripened into fact. While his elevation to the High Court bench will be peculiarly welcome to the Old Boys and Trustees of the Aligarh College, we are sure their greatest pleasure will be to hear of his success as an independent, conscientious and upright Judge who strove to do even-handed justice between man and man. We are abundantly justified in the belief that success of this kind will be his in ample measure.

The New Judge for the High Court of Allahabad

Now that Mr. Montagu has expressed regret about his unfortunate remarks concerning the homogeneity of the Muhammadans of India and the absence of any relations between the Muhammadans of Bengal and the rest of their co-religionists, we shall spare him a homily on the dangers of rash generalisations about men and things in the East. We must not forget that Mr. Montagu had on a previous occasion himself borne testimony to the extra-territorial patriotism of the Mussalmans which laughed at distance and material separation, and his present statement in reply to Mr. MacCullum Scott, that "he recognized that Muhammadans were animated by a religious feeling which produces unity, making them independent of geographical or racial separation," is quite consistent with his earlier remarks. We shall, therefore, forget—and, if need be, forgive—the wholly inconsistent remarks about the position of Mussalmans in Bengal and the relationship in which they stand to those of the rest of India which intervened. The Statesman writes that, "naturally these extraordinary statements excited much irritation among the Muhammadans, and for some time past they have been busy in passing resolutions in every district, challenging Mr. Montagu's assertions. At length the Under-Secretary has bowed before the storm." With reference to Mr. Montagu's reply cabled by Reuter on the 20th instant, the Statesman comments that "such a recantation may well gratify Indian Muhammadans and it will possibly help to modify Mr. Montagu's astonishing self-confidence." No doubt the Mussalmans would also think that to have induced an Under-Secretary of State to admit an error "is a triumph upon which they can fairly congratulate themselves." But we hope there will be no vainglorious jubilation at this, for, although Mr. Montagu's over-confidence and recent rash assertions have considerably irritated the Mussalmans, they must recognize that he is a liberal-minded Minister, and they have more to gain by persuading him to acknowledge realities than by humiliating him with excessive and loudly proclaimed jubilation. Now that Mr. Montagu has once more taken the right view of Moslem feelings and Moslem solidarity, the question arises, what will happen in the case of those of our Indian contemporaries that crowed loudly and triumphantly at his rash generalisation and, denying solidarity to the Mussalmans, considered the Muhammadans of Bengal as a limb entirely torn off from the body of Islam. Would they now begin to denounce the erstwhile Daniel come to judgment, or would they follow his latest move and recant their heresies? We must wait and see.

It is somewhat amusing to discover in some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries just those failings which they had often condemned in Indian journals and on which they had read long sermons to sable humanity. These failings generally used to be intemperate expression and the inclination to be agin' the Government. We have seen often and often enough instances of intemperate expressions in Anglo-Indian papers of great position and weight, yet somehow the beam in their own eyes was left undetected by these discoverers of the mote in the Indian optic. The inclination to write agin' the Government was naturally less evident. But since the Government of India has removed the capital from Calcutta some of our local contemporaries find nothing good in the Supreme Government and hold it up to ridicule on every conceivable occasion. The latest instance has been the letter of the Government of India addressed to the Local Government of the new Province of Behar and Orissa. Before waiting to see what it contained, some of our local Anglo-Indian contemporaries ran away with the idea that this was another instance of the autocratic behaviour of the Supreme Government, and announced to the world at large the fact that the Government of India had already made up their mind to give Behar a separate High Court and had asked the Local Government of the new Province to consult the Calcutta High Court only in the matter of the number of Judges that would be required. On this peg they hung many a sermon on the evils of despotic rule, and a careful researchist may perhaps find in these sermons many a virtue ascribed to provincial autonomy which has been severely condemned whenever desired by Indian politicians and publicists. However, the truth is now out, and the letters of the Government of India have been published for all to see. There is no tinge of autocracy therein and, what is more, none is alleged to exist even by our contemporaries that had condemned the Government for these very letters only a little while ago. The Government of India have asked the Local Government to favour them with the matured opinion on the question, and if they consider a separate High Court necessary for Behar, they are requested to consult the High Court of Calcutta as regards the size of the new High Court. With a view to assist the Local Government in arriving at a correct conclusion, the amplest statistics have been asked for from the Calcutta High Court. We do not see what there is to condemn in all this, and although we have never hesitated to express disagreement with the views of the Government of India whenever we had occasion to differ, we cannot say we like the idea of any stick being good enough for the Supreme Government. The Viceroy and his colleagues should not be the only people against whom every allegation should be published or credited. If they do not deserve more consideration than less eminent persons, surely they deserve at least as much. If we have any criticism to offer on the subject of the High Court of Behar it is this, that when the Government of India were making Behar, Orissa and Chota Nagpur a separate province, they should have arranged to give it a separate High Court and a separate University. To have swallowed up the whole and to object to swallow two small minnows is neither logic nor statesmanship. It is true that when Lord Curzon separated Eastern Bengal even he did not venture to go so far as to give the new province a High Court. But he knew that while he would be offending the Hindus of Western Bengal he would not be enlisting the sympathy of the Hindus of the other provinces either by making a province in which the Muhammadans predominated a self-contained area. Hence his hesitation. In the present case the annulment of the partition has pleased the Hindus of Bengal and the rest of India as well, and there was no likelihood of any agitation against making Behar a self-contained area. By not doing so in December last the Government of India have given the cue to agitation needlessly. Every large province should normally be self-contained, and the burden of proof lies on those who wish to deny it a High Court and a University. Hitherto we have not come across any argument against these in the case of Behar, and Bengalee agitation against them shows little beyond the greed of a section of the Bengalee lawyers and the love of power of some other sections of Bengalees. Now, however, agitation cannot be helped and while we must wait for the opinion of the Local Government, Behar must put up with the Bengalee agitation as part of the bargain. But when the organs of Bengalee opinion next talk of the identity of interests in India, Moslem as well as Hindu, we trust our Behar friends will remember that there is such a thing as a difference of immediate interests, such as is only too apparent now in the case of the immediate interests of Behar and Bengal. The Mussalmans have too long been preached to in the name of Indian Nationality, and Beharees have vied with Bengalees in the length and solemnity of these homilies. It is their turn now to smile a little, if not laugh outright, at the Indian Nationalism exhibited by the Bengalee coadjutors of Modern Behar.

A High Court for Behar.

ABOUT two months ago Mr Abdul Wali Khan, who served in the Quetta Staff College for some time some years ago, and is of a highly enterprising turn of mind, wrote to us that he was leaving for Tripoli after arranging for his journey at Constantinople, and very kindly promised, if he succeeded in getting through, to work as our honorary War Correspondent. We heard from him from Aden, and this week's Mail brings us a letter from him from Alexandria. He gives an interesting account of his landing at Suez and his stay in Alexandria, and in future we hope to publish equally interesting accounts sent by him of the Islamic forces in Lybia and their encounters with the Italians. He saw at Suez a neat little ship painted white which at first sight appeared to be a P. and O. Mail Steamer, but which turned out to be a Turkish Hospital Ship. A fellow passenger, a venerable Persian gentleman, Syed Amin of Meshed, told him he had seen her at Jeddah a few months ago, and that she was there to pick up the Turkish sick and wounded returning home from Yemen. He very much felt inclined to visit the Hospital Ship, but as he had to catch a steamer for the onward journey, he had to give up the idea for want of time. But luckily for him, just as the train was leaving Suez, a Turkish sailor got in, and as he was passing through the corridor of the train, Mr. Abdul Wali Khan requested his Persian fellow-passenger, who, by the way, turned out to be a polyglot, to ask the Turkish Jack Tar to travel with them. That he did, and on the way supplied all the necessary information. On learning that about fifty of the sick and wounded were on board the Hospital Ship, Mr Abdul Wali Khan offered a sovereign and desired the Turkish sailor to write a letter in Turkish to her Commander on his behalf. The Turkish Jack Tar thankfully declined, saying that it was contrary to the Ottoman Marine Law to solicit or accept anything, specially money, without the previous consent of the Turkish Sea Lord. This is the present condition of ordinary sailors under a Government which was believed to be synonymous with bakhshish-rule before the advent of the Young Turk. The sailor assured Mr. Abdul Wali Khan that they had every comfort on board, and that the Suez people supplied them daily with plenty of fruit. The man carried himself like a well-drilled soldier and but for the fez would have passed for a British bluejacket. On arriving at Alexandria, Mr. Abdul Wali Khan went out news-gleaning and in the "Mashia Mohamed Ali Pasha," the square named after the founder of the Khedival dynasty, he saw copies of Al-Ahram, Al-Liwa and Al-Moayyed being sold by the hundred among the crowds of café-loungers sipping their coffee. On reading the news of the severe chastisement inflicted on the Italians by Mulazim Mohamed Effendi Abdul Zuhab, the Turkish Commander at Tobruk, the men got up and sang a rollicking chorus in Turkish. They seemed highly delighted with the news and one after another went over to a group of "Westerners," i.e., the Arabs of Tripoli, who are living in Alexandria since the massacres of October last, and congratulated them. These Tripolitans, writes our Correspondent, are a fine lot, and have a martial bearing. They wear a rather thick-brimmed Turkish fez, and their long black silk robes indicate their nationality and make them respected everywhere in the town. They are the guests of the Egyptians as long as the war lasts. Mr Abdul Wali Khan had a chat with one of these and was convinced that nothing would now ever induce them to part with the Ottomans. Our Correspondent read in the English journal, the Egyptian Gazette, which is the organ of the Occupation, that Enver Bey had paid a flying visit to Alexandria and had gone back. This may be true for all we know, as we learn from Egyptian papers that his mother had come to Egypt in order to visit him after the Italian canard about his death. Mr. Abdul Wali Khan was to have left in the last week of May by the Russian Steamer Olga to Constantinople, and we await his next letter from the seat of the Caliphate with great eagerness, and even impatience, and we are sure our readers share our feelings and our gratefulness to this enterprising Moslem.

WE WOULD earnestly invite the attention of our readers to our advertisement columns where an appeal of The Islamia High School of Etawah. Maulvi Bashiruddin the editor of Al-Bashir, who is the Honorary Manager of the Islamia High School of Etawah, is published.

This school is an example of a tiny seed, unselfishly planted and constantly and carefully looked after, growing into a flourishing tree. Its success is not less remarkable than that of the Aligarh College itself, and considering the respective ranks of their founders and their personal influence in official and Moslem circles, the smaller and less ambitious institution can well challenge comparison with the greater. We have seen its small beginnings, the courage and hope of its indefatigable Founder Manager, Maulvi Bashiruddin, was the only asset of the school, and now that it is located in a fine building of its own, and has no less than 200 boarders and 150 day scholars, when its library has about 5,000 books and a thousand manuscripts and historical documents, when its teaching staff is paid more than Rs 15,000 a year, and about Rs 2,000 are paid to poor students as "debts of honour", we must confess we stand amazed at the success of one whose poverty puts to shame the riches of so many other Mussulmans and whose friendliness—if we may strain the term a little—has proved far more useful than the so-called "influence" of so many Moslem leaders. Well may he say, "Alone I did it!" It is indeed a hopeful sign that the boarding-house is now full to overflowing and more accommodation is required both for the school and the hostel. We appeal to all Mussalmans, rich and poor—and specially to the poor for whose needs the school has been founded—to come to the assistance of Maulvi Bashiruddin. Surely there are few Mussalmans who cannot do what he has done if they will only persist and work unselfishly. If all cannot be Syed Ahmed Khan, we feel sure most people can be Bashiruddin. In this way his life is even a better lesson of something attempted, something done.

WE PUBLISH in our advertisement columns the notice of a new weekly journal in Urdu which is to be launched by Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, of this town, who has a close acquaintance with Islamic literature and is well known as a public speaker in Urdu and as a writer in Urdu periodicals. It is a hopeful sign of the times that the energies of such men are being attracted towards Urdu journalism which had too long been a monopoly of those who had come to it after having failed everywhere else. Journalism needs the best men of a country and community and not the leftovers of other trades and occupations, and we hope Al-Ahram would soon make its way to the front rank of Urdu journalism.

WE HAVE received by the last mail a letter from the Imperial Ottoman Bank, Constantinople, dated 23rd May, informing us that the Bank of Bengal, Calcutta, have handed them under our instructions a cheque for £600 sterling and that the equivalent of that amount has been placed to the credit of the Red Crescent Society for the relief of the sufferers at Tripoli. Our readers would perhaps remember, that we sent the Imperial Ottoman Bank a draft for £600 sterling on the 1st May, as we published in the issue of the 4th of May. The formal receipt from the Inspector-General of the Red Crescent Society is expected by the next mail. It is our ardent wish to send within a few weeks another instalment to Turkey, but, unless our readers come to our assistance more generously, we fear the amount of the instalment would not be as large as we have hitherto been able to send. We hope our readers will respond to the call of sufferers in Tripoli even more generously than they have hitherto done, and enable us to send in a few weeks another instalment of at least £500 sterling. As a reference to a statement printed below giving details of the collection for the Turkish Relief Fund will show, we have collected hitherto Rs 19,076-15-6, out of which we have forwarded to Turkey Rs 15,000 in two instalments. The balance at present in hand is, therefore, Rs. 4,076-15-6.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND

	Rs	A	P
Abdul Rahaman, Esq, Adhami, Nanital .	2	0	0
M. Karim Bux Sahib	2	0	0
Bashir Hasan Sahib	1	0	0
Risaldar Ismail Khan Sahib	1	0	0
Minor Subscriptions	1	0	0
M. Fazle Huq, Esq, Chhatarpur State	5	0	0
Through Siraj-ud-din Ahmed Sahib, the Muhammadans of Chhatarpur State, C. I ...	5	0	0
Ali Mohammed Sahib, Yas, Bareilly	10	0	0
Dr. Said Kaza	5	0	0
A Mussalman, Aurangabad, Deccan	1	0	0
Azizur Rahman, Esq, Miangunj Unao	10	0	0
Abdul Qadir Sahib, Jhelum	4	0	0
Through Mushir Husain, Esq, Qidwai, Srinagar
Kazim Husain Esq, and five others	20	0	0
A few Ladies	25	0	0
Abdul Karim Sahib, Barisal ..	40	0	0
Through Mhd. Ibrahim Sahib, Lucknow--
Muhammadan Staff of the I.D.T., Lucknow...	23	7	0
S. Miraj-ud-din, Moga	2	0	0
Habibul Islam Sahib, Allahabad	10	0	0
Abdul Majeed Khan Sahib, Meerut	5	0	0
M. Saiduddin Alum, Esq, Kheri	3	0	0
Dost Mohamed Esq, Behar ...	4	0	0
Amount Received during the week ...	179	7	0
Less announced by Mistake on the 25th May	0	3	6
	179	10	6
Amount previously acknowledged ...	18,897	5	0
TOTAL RS.	19,076	15	6

MISCELLANEOUS TURKISH RELIEF FUND COLLECTIONS.

Name of place.	Name of person in charge of the Fund.	THE WORK'S PROGRESS.				PROGRESS UP TO DATE.				REMARKS.
		Amount collected.		Amount forwarded.		Amount collected.		Amount forwarded.
		Rs.	A.	Rs.	A. P.	Rs.	A. P.	Rs.	A. P.
Karachi (Sind).	Seth Haji Ali Gulab Haroon.	311	"	3	"	M. O. Charges.		20,634	3	19,343	13 1/2

The Comrade.

Some War Publications*

II.

IN another chapter of his book Sir Thomas Barclay deals with Italy's treaty obligations, in which he, of course, refers to the Treaty of Paris of 1856, the Treaty of London of 1871 and the Treaty of Berlin of 1878, and then distinguishes between the usurpation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary and the Tripolitan raid of Italy. "There has been," he says, "no de facto annexation to Italy, no de facto severance of the Province from the Ottoman Empire. The Treaty of 1856 in the case of Tripolitana and Cyrenaica has its full force and effect, undiminished by precedents of any kind." Russia is a bad model for any State in the domain of international morality, but, as Sir Thomas points out, when Russia proposed in 1871, that circumstances having changed since 1856, a modification in certain of the provisions of the Treaty of Paris was necessary, even she submitted her proposals to a fresh Conference of the Powers. The protocol, which forms part of the public law of Europe, runs as follows --

It is an essential principle of the law of nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers, by means of an amicable arrangement.

But Italy's breaches of faith go further than such ignoring of a well-known general principle. Article 8, of the Treaty of Paris has a special application to the case of Turkey and provides that

If any difference arise between the Sublime Porte and one or more signatories threatening the maintenance of their good relations, the Sublime Porte and any or each of these Powers, before resorting to force, will place the other contracting parties in a position to prevent recourse to such an extremity by their mediating influence.

In this connection Sir Thomas Barclay refers to the reply of Sir Edward Grey on 3rd November to a question of Mr. Gwynn in which he said that "the first communication of any intention to seize Tripoli which His Majesty's Government received was the notification of the declaration of war on 30th September." If we are to believe this statement—as we must—then Italy gave no opportunity to at least one of the contracting parties of 1856, before proceeding to extremities, to exercise any "mediating influence." Says Sir Thomas, "Yet the terms of this provision are absolute; there is no loophole clause in it reducing its character to that merely of a pious injunction. It was deliberately framed to prevent the creation of faits accomplis by just such an action as Italy has taken." The curious who have faith in the binding force of the Hague Conventions may refer to another chapter of this book in which Sir Thomas brings out their application to the various aspects of the present war, particularly the position of neutrals in respect to mediation, and some of the methods of carrying on warfare, such as the Declaration adopted in the Hague Conference of 1899 prohibiting "the launching of projectiles and explosives from balloons or by other similar new methods," which both Turkey and Italy ratified, although Turkey ratified in extremis in 1907.

Before dealing with other chapters of Sir Thomas's book, it would be better to deal with the other publications under review so as to give some glimpses of the war before discussing the conclusions at which Sir Thomas arrived before the close of the last year. Mr. Francis McCullagh is now too well known to need an introduction, and the brochure dealing with the war which Messrs. W. Speaight and Sons have brought out is mostly a rechauffe of his articles. In an introduction of about twenty-five pages he deals among other things with the genesis of the war. He states that almost unobserved a new Chauvinist party had been growing up during the last few decades in Italy, consisting of literary men like Gabriele d'Annunzio, "who seems to be blossoming into a sort of Italian Kipling." He is the author of a book called "The Ship" of which the burden is "imperialism, expansion, acquisition of colonies, a taking up of the White Man's burden." Associated with him in the Chauvinist campaign were a large number of journalists, newspaper proprietors and professional men, most of whom are in Tripoli, taking the most intense interest in the war and writing an enormous amount about it. But Mr. McCullagh, says this conflict "is not the work of a clique." He, however, explains that "it is the work of one clique which has 'roped in' a great number of other cliques." He even goes so far as to say that "it may even be called a national war." There was, he states, a general disposition amongst civilians to make the Government employ the fleet and the army in some brilliant exploit, and there was a keen desire in military circles as has been amply proved, to wipe off the stain of Adowa. Moreover, the great economic and financial prosperity of Northern Italy during the last decade had supplied what are commonly, but in this case, as events have shown, inaptly, called "the sinews of war." Then, again, high finance, which generally supplies the key to every grave political situation, was represented by the Banco di Roma, which had been pacifically penetrating Tripoli for many years. Mr. McCullagh writes:—

* The first part of this article appeared in the issue of the 1st instant.

It acquired enormous tracts of land, it established or financed corn mills and other industrial undertakings; it prospected for phosphates and minerals. The director of the Bank was a very able business man, a sort of little Cecil Rhodes up his way—Signor Pacelli. Signor Pacelli is a friend of Baron Sonnino, the well-known Conservative leader and proprietor of an ultra Catholic and ultra-jingoistic newspaper, the Giornale d'Italia. Signor Pacelli has friends in every camp. He has friends even in the Government, for some members of the present Cabinet are financially interested in the Bank. The Italians bitterly complained of the obstacles thrown in their way by the Turks, but personally I cannot sympathise very much with the Italians in this matter, since the object of the Bank was undoubtedly to sap Turkish rule in the Tripolitaine and pave the way for the entry of the Italians.

Mr. McCullagh also seems to think that it was jealousy of the Germans that precipitated the Italian raid "the Agadir coup led directly to the Tripoli coup." He gives some particulars of German industrial success in the Tripolitaine. Then there was the fear that if the present opportunity was missed another would not occur at all. "She (Italy) had evidently expected that the revolution would end in the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire, but soon she saw that under the new régime Turkey was likely to get stronger rather than weaker from a military point of view." Europe had already been disconcerted by the re-organisation of the army under Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, and what particularly alarmed Italy was a Turkish proposal to form a sort of great territorial army among the Arab tribes in the Tripolitaine. In this connection it must also be noted that in the course of a famous conversation the War Minister of Turkey had asked Haqqi Pasha if he could guarantee the absence of any hostile designs against Tripoli on the part of Italy, and that the latter, fresh from his Italian bridge-parties and with his personal ties with Italy, declared that Shevket Pasha might safely withdraw the bulk of the Tripoli garrison for service in Arabia. This was accordingly done, and further detachments were sent to fill up certain cadres in the European garrisons. Thus not only was Italy ripe for an adventure, but in Tripoli, as Mr. McCullagh says, "the conditions for a successful and not too dangerous adventure seemed ideal." Luckily for Turkey, even when her Tripolitan garrison was depleted, the stock of ammunition provided for the full garrison was left in Tripoli, and with the help of that and the stores of rifles and cartridges brought in by the Derna a few days before the ultimatum, and, in addition to these, the rifles and ammunition captured from the Italians themselves, the territorial army of the Arab tribes which Mahmoud Shevket Pasha intended to organise has already been formed through the action of Italy, and, what is more, it has seen a good deal of warfare and tasted blood.

As regards the campaign itself, the Times military correspondent has done more than justice to the Italian case during the first three weeks of October. But it is unfortunate that nothing has yet been published from the Turkish side throwing light on the other side of the picture. However, in an article of Mr. McCullagh's which we reproduced at the time, we had a fleeting glimpse of the Turks retiring from Tripoli practically without firing a shot, not because of their inefficiency, but because of their humanity. Mr. McCullagh refers to the local consuls as "a weak-minded crew of diplomatic derelicts who were originally sent to Tripoli as to a quiet backwater out of harm's way." It was two of these consuls who tried, at first without success, to persuade the Ottoman general to leave the town of Tripoli, and, finally, when he showed his determination to contest "every inch of the ground, it was they who roundly accused him of sheltering behind the women and children in a poorly fortified town, relying in this way on the humanity of the Italians which would have prevented their bombardment such a place. Subsequent events have shown what reliance can be placed on the humanity of the Italians and even on their leaving unfortified towns, as they should be according to international law, immune from a bombardment. But the tactics of the consuls succeeded, and an opportunity was given to the Italians to impute the Turkish retreat from Tripoli to cowardice. "This," wrote Mr. McCullagh quite early in the campaign, "was an ungenerous remark for any soldier to make of a brave opponent, and it was an untrue remark." How ridiculously untrue the remark was the sequel has shown. But the Turks gave the Italians something more than the opportunity of an untrue and ungenerous gibe, inasmuch as they allowed the Italian troops to disembark in peace when they could have held them at bay. In one of his articles Mr. McCullagh writes:—

What endless damage the Turks could have inflicted on them! Hidden behind clumps of earth, concealed in ravines and narrow lanes, they could have waited for the Italian sailors to land and could have picked off great numbers of them as they did so. There are only one thousand bluejackets in all against ten thousand Turks and Arabs and once the bluejackets had entered the town, the fleet could not well continue to bombard it.

In another article he writes:—

Had the Turks remained and escaped being crushed under the ruins of the town, they could easily have cut the water-supply before they left. Until the Italian army arrived, they could easily have rushed the town, where the position of the bluejackets was in the last degree critical. There were still only about a thousand bluejackets in the city, and on the first night they actually confined themselves to occupying the old town wall built by Charles V. and mounting their cannon on it. Next day they occupied the positions which the soldiers now hold on the edge of the desert, but only a small number were there, and the connection between them was so bad that even Hottentots could have slipped between them and the town. The sailors had not time for sleep, and the night attacks of the Turks worried them beyond endurance. They were all very close to the breaking-point, and had the Turks conducted their attacks with any system the sailors (or such of them as survived) would have had to go back to their ships. For three nights on end none of them had any sleep, and they were hardly able to walk through fatigue. The Italian Commanders became extremely alarmed and desperately afraid that any tidings regarding their condition should reach the Turks through Press cablegrams from Tripoli. . . . An order consequently went forth to the effect that all telegrams, Press or private, must go to Rome for a second dose of censorship. . . . At the same time a war ship was sent under full steam to Italy in order to hurry up any transports which it might meet with on the way.

Both Mr. McCullagh, and Mr. E. N. Bennet—the theology tutor of Hertford College, Oxford, who, although a "Pro-Buer" in his politics, had commanded the Oxford Contingent in the Boer War—agree in regarding the Italian army as "very young and inexperienced." They consider them also very excitable and "panicky." Mr. McCullagh writes:—

But this "panicky" feeling was principally due to temperament, the greater proportion of the troops being drawn from the excitable population of Sicily and Southern Italy. To give you an idea of how "jumpy" the Italian soldiers are, I need only mention that there is an alarm every night along the fringe of the desert. Sentinels fire at dogs, at bats, and at wholly imaginary objects, until they rouse the whole camp and firing goes on for hours. Once when a number of Italian officers went out into the desert towards nightfall, their men biased away at them under the impression that they were Arabs, and the officers had to remain out in the desert all night, lying flat on the sand. In order to prevent this incessant waste of ammunition and this deprivation of sleep for the soldiers, the Italians have now placed powerful naval searchlights along the edge of the desert. Each light is kept swinging backwards and forwards, and if it is kept too long at any one point, the sentinels at some other point which is left in darkness are sure to begin firing at some bogey or other. Then the light is swung round to the threatened point, and the sentinels there are as happy as a nervous child, frightened of the dark, when, in order to still its shrieking, mother brings a lighted candle to the room.

Naturally the Italian descriptions of the fighting of such soldiers appears most ridiculous to war correspondents who have themselves been under fire like Mr. Bennet. The following would no doubt be read with much amusement by our readers:—

It was in front of Don-Meliana on October 10th that the rival forces first met face to face. It was a trifling affair, a night reconnaissance in front of the Italian position made by about 250 Turks; but the Italian journals went into raptures over it, and wrote of this petty skirmish as if it had been a Jena or an Austerlitz. One emotional gentleman on this occasion eclipsed all his confrères. He wrote that on the approach of the Turks in the moonlight—he puts the number at 300—he climbed a palm tree; but owing to the "terrible" and deadly fire opened by the enemy—not a single Italian was even grazed—he speedily descended from his perch. This correspondent actually went on to say that "at least half" of the Turks must have been "killed" or "seriously wounded" by the Italian fire, and apparently believes—inasmuch as only one Turk was found next day—that the 150 unwounded men each carried off a dead or wounded comrade! It really is an insult to the readers of our newspapers that ignorant and inexperienced persons of this type should masquerade as war correspondents. . . . Let me give one further example. During the first week of November the Italians made an attempt with an absolutely overwhelming force to regain some of the coast they had abandoned on October 27th. An Italian correspondent writes the most inflated nonsense about this "Magnificent advance, carried out with order, rapidity, and dash." The ground was black with soldiers. . . . like a vast ant-hill. As the battle (sic) advanced. . . . it was marvellous to watch the soldiers who fought like veterans. The scene was like one of those classical attacks made by the Japanese. The men worked in two, one man digging up the soil with his bayonet, while the other opened fire. When a sufficiently large hole had been made, both men crept in.

it and continued shooting . . . At twilight the firing ceased . . . and away towards the town . . . rose a large and loud shouting of Viva Italia!" The above is a specimen of the effeminate twaddle which forms the war pabulum of the Italian newspapers. If the modern journalist employs such language to describe a trifling skirmish, one wonders what he could write about serious warfare. How the Japanese must laugh at these Italian analogies! The wonderful assaults which carried the defences of Port Arthur and worsted the troops of a first-class military Power at Mukden are compared to the timid skirmishing of an enormous force faced by a handful of undisciplined Arabs! Fancy the idea of Japanese troops under such circumstances stopping to dig holes and creep into them!

Islam in Russia.

1

THE Russian empire, comprising one-sixth of the land surface of the globe, is a continuous stretch of territory from the Baltic to the Pacific. It has within its limits a striking uniformity of physical feature and equally striking variety of racial type. According to the first general census taken in 1897 the population of the whole empire was 129,200,000, comprising Slavs, Finns, Poles, Serbs, Bulgars, Jews, Armenians, Tartars, Persians and several aboriginal tribes of Central Asia. Since then no organised and systematic enumeration of the peoples has been undertaken by the State, though various departmental estimates are available based more or less on reliable data. The Central Statistical Committee in Russia prepared a detailed estimate in 1906 which placed the population of the empire at 149,259,300. The Committee had taken every precaution to achieve as close an accuracy of results as could reasonably be hoped for in a task of such magnitude. The conditions of life in Russia do not at present lend themselves to the methods of the statistician, however elaborate they may be. Apart from the colossal extent of the area of operations, no ingenuity of method can successfully cope with the elusive modes of living and habits of the tribes, some of whom are little known even to ethnology—the hair-naked nomads of the plains, the dwellers of the caves and of the regions of perpetual snow. Still, however, it may be presumed that the Committee had arrived at a rough approximation of the relative strength of the races and creeds within the Russian empire.

The Slavs are, it need hardly be said, the dominant race in Russia and belong to the Orthodox Greek Church. There is, also, a considerable number of Christians belonging to other denominations, notable amongst them being Roman Catholics, Dissenters, Armenian Catholics and Lutherans. Next in importance, however, to the Orthodox Greek Church, which claims its devotees to the number of about 95 millions, is the religion of Islam. According to the census of 1897 the number of the Mussalmans in the Russian empire, with the exception of those in the Khanates of Khiva and Bokhara, was about 14,000,000. As, however, the total population of the empire has been calculated to have increased by 22 per cent since then, the figure for the Mussalmans must be placed much beyond the original estimate. Mrs. S. Bobrovnikoff in her very interesting and comprehensive survey of the "Moslems in Russia," which appeared in the Moslem World in January 1911, gives 20 millions as the approximate figure for the Mussalmans, including those of Khiva and Bokhara. This estimate allows for the general increase of 22 per cent though the figures for Khiva and Bokhara are, in the nature of the case, merely conjectural. The number of the new converts has also been altogether left out of account. Yet it is a matter of common knowledge that conversion to Islam, especially amongst the aboriginal tribes of south-east Russia and Central Asia, is going on at a rapid pace. In fact, as the writer herself is not slow to admit, sometimes it happens that whole villages of pagan tribes embrace Islam within the first year they come under the influence of Islamic teaching. And it should also be borne in mind that this process of peaceful penetration is only of recent growth. As long as the Mussalmans enjoyed political ascendancy in Russia, they observed a degree of toleration that has not yet been surpassed in the religious history of the world. They built and endowed churches and maintained priests at the expense of the State, and the privileges they allowed to the Christian races rendered the task of the Moslem missionaries well nigh impossible. With the break-up of the Khanate of Kazan the tide of Slav conquest swept over Central Asia and Siberia; and since then a systematic effort has been going on under the direct inspiration of the State to impose Christianity on the pagan tribes and stop all voluntary conversion to Islam. It was only in 1905 that a manifesto was issued granting full religious liberty to the subjects of the Tsar. It is, however, a remarkable fact that the greatest expansion of Islam in Russia coincides with the most drastic régime of despotism, persecution and intolerance. Tribe after tribe was being won over to Islam just when the State Church was carrying on a ruthless campaign against heresy. Immediately after the freedom of conscience was recognised as the birthright of man, thousands of aborigines openly declared themselves as Moslems, although they had hitherto been officially returned as Christians. Forty thousand such declarations have been recorded in the case of a single tribe. In view of these considerations it is difficult to believe that the figure of 20 millions accurately represents the strength of Islam in Russia. However, in the absence of an up-to-date and comprehensive estimate this figure may be taken as the nearest approximation to truth. Thus, it would be seen that the Russian Moslems constitute one-seventh part of the total population of the empire. And, in spite of the various political disabilities to which they are subject, their number continues to grow steadily every year, and by virtue of their position, strength and solidarity they are destined to play an important part in the future history of the land they live in.

The early history of the spread of Islam in Russia yet awaits the historian who would work up the scattered mass of materials into a coherent narrative. At present we have isolated details buried away in a literature of bewildering variety and complexity. Mr. T. W. Arnold in "The Preaching of Islam" has constructed a chapter on the subject with tremendous labour and skill which shows the early struggles of Islam in the heart of Asia and south-east Russia in the right perspective of history. He could not, however, do full justice to the subject because he was hampered by the limitations of the particular thesis on which he was engaged. The story of the growth of Islam in Russia yet remains to be told on an ampler scale. We can do no more than make a hurried reference to the history of the expansion of Islam in the region under notice. After the death of Changiz Khan, the founder of the Tartar dynasty, the colossal empire that he had reared by fire and sword was divided by his sons into three separate and independent kingdoms. The dominions of Central Asia and the numerous principalities of Russia became a distinct empire under one of his sons who was at the head of the famous "Golden Horde." The chief camping ground of this section of the Mongols was the extensive plain watered by the Volga. Sarai, their capital city, was founded on its bank. It was here that the Khan received the homage and the tributes of the Russian princes. Barka Khan was the first Mongol ruling prince who embraced Islam. He was the chief of the Golden Horde from 1256 A.D. to 1265 A.D. His conversion raised a storm of opposition amongst the tribes and his efforts to win new converts were not very successful. With the advent of Uzbek Khan to power, the preaching of Islam amongst the Golden Horde itself was undertaken with energy and zeal. It was owing to his devotion and efforts that a considerable portion of the Mongol tribes was won over to the Divine faith. He matured a plan for the conversion of the whole of Russia, but he could not put it to execution on account of his singularly tolerant views in matters of religion. Indeed, his reign was noted for the great liberty that his Christian subjects enjoyed and his name will remain illustrious in the history of Islam for the most remarkable charter of religious freedom that he granted to the Metropolitan Peter in 1313. Before Uzbek Khan came to power and, indeed, even before the Golden Horde had established political domination over Russia, the Moslem Bulgarians, who had migrated to the banks of the Volga in the tenth century, had tried to win the Russians to Islam but had failed. A very curious yet authentic episode is associated with the story of their efforts. According to the Russian chronicles himself, the Bulgarians attempted to convert Vladimir, the then sovereign of Russia, who was dissatisfied with his pagan creed and wanted to adopt some more satisfying religion. He was almost persuaded to accept Islam, but at the last moment he held back because he could not reconcile himself to the rite of circumcision and the prohibition of wine. He was finally won to the faith of the Greek Church by the glowing accounts his messengers brought to him from Constantinople about the pomp and circumstance of the Greek cathedrals and their priests. The entire population was ordered to adopt the new faith and, thus, Christianity became the national religion of Russia. Voluntary conversion to Islam, however, went on even in the face of immense opposition and the Finns of the Volga and the Tchuvash of the south became Mussalmans in overwhelming numbers. The whole of the Finnish population of this part of the country would have been converted to Islam if the Russian Government had not imposed severe penalties on such conversions.

The Kirghiz form one of the most important tribes of Central Asia and Eastern Russia. Their conversion to Islam is due to a curious blunder on the part of the Russian government. They came under the political sway of Russia about the middle of the eighteenth century. The government thought that they were all Mussalmans and ethnographically the same as the Tartars of the Volga. They were, therefore, treated as such, in spite of their protests and expostulations. The Government even went to the length of building mosques for them and sending Mullahs to instruct the young in the tenets of the Moslem faith. After a short time almost the whole tribe became Mussalman in reality. When the Government woke up to its blunder it sought to undo the work it had unconsciously done, by attempting to force Christianity on them as, indeed, on all its Moslem subjects in Europe. "The labours of the clergy were actively seconded by the police and the civil authorities, but though a certain number of Tartars were baptized it had to be admitted that the new converts 'shamelessly retain many horrid Tartar customs, and neither hold nor know the Christian faith'." It was even ordered 'to pacify, imprison, put in iron, and thereby unteach and frighten from the Tartar faith those who, though baptized, do not obey the admonitions of the Metropolitan'. These and even more brutal methods proved equally ineffectual. The so-called 'Baptized Tartars' are Christian only in name and would gladly return to Islam if the terrors of the inquisition were taken away. Even as it is, more than 10,000 fall back every year into the fold of Islam again, and the remaining number of 110,000 'baptized Tartars' may soon be expected to openly profess the religion which they have never ceased to believe in their heart of hearts.

The steady progress of Islam in Russia against tremendous odds may well furnish a student of comparative religions, with food for reflection. Among the provinces of Asiatic Russia, Islam is the predominant religion in Transaspia and Akmolinsk. In the provinces of Ufa, Kama, Terek, Elisavetpol, Uralsk, Daghestan and Baku in European Russia the Mussalmans are found in great majority, while in the extensive provinces of Kazan, Orenburg, Astrakhan and Erivan they are in the proportion of between 20 to 50 per cent. In fact, they are to be met with in every part of the Russian empire, though their number is insignificant in the north and the west of European Russia. From the shores of the Black Sea to the confines of Central Asia they live in one compact mass. They are expanding into central Russia and Siberia by slow degrees. Their progress would have been much more rapid if the laws of Russia had allowed perfect religious tolerance. Even as it is, the expansion of Islam amongst the pagan tribes and, to a lesser degree, amongst the Christians of Central and south-east Russia is a phenomenon well worth pondering. Of course, the usual explanation may very well serve in this case, that Islam appeals with an irresistible force to the primitive mind. It is, however, conveniently forgotten that a positive, intense individual belief is the only criterion of the vitality of a religious doctrine, and, as regards the civilised mind, the highly complex mental apparatus of European humanity has almost ceased to be actively responsive to any religious appeal at all. The primitive mind cannot live without some definite philosophy of life. The higher mind rejects all philosophies as so many dogmas and conventions. Christianity fails to appeal to the uncivilised races because it is too delicate and complex for their crude mentality. It fails to satisfy the most civilised types of Western humanity on account of its crude and impossible doctrines. The dilemma is clearly not very inspiring to the Christian missionaries in their unselfish efforts at evangelisation in foreign lands and amongst the non-Christian races of mankind.

After all the only test of the utility of a religious belief is that it not only satisfies the hearts of those who accept it, but also furnishes them with practical standards of conduct in social life. In Russia Islam has won its way into the hearts of millions and has inspired them with a set of ideals for their secular development. In the clash of rival cultures, Islam is triumphantly holding its own and seems to have endowed the true believers with the qualities that have so far stood them in good stead for the severe struggle they have to wage for their existence. All repressive weapons with which the State equipped the Church in its fight against Islam have failed. The spiritual weapons have also been tried with little success. Ilminsky, a professor of the Ecclesiastical Academy of the University of Kazan, organised an elaborate system of training missionaries for proselytising work amongst the pagans and the Tartars, opened schools in which instruction was given in the languages of the people, translated hundreds of works on Christianity into those languages and sought to convert the tribes through the village schools he established throughout the provinces of Eastern Russia. The only result of his gigantic labours has so far been that a few thousand pagans have been enrolled as Christians, while the "System of Ilminsky" has made absolutely no impression on the life and religion of the Tartars. As a matter of fact, it has accelerated the process of peaceful penetration with which Islam is winning its way among the pagan tribes.

We have in this short survey, dealt with the salient features of Islam in Russia, the number of the Mussalmans and their territorial distribution. We have yet to deal with the much more important matters concerning their present political status, social conditions, and intellectual and moral atmosphere. We have also to consider their future prospects in the Russian empire and the value of the contribution they may make to the general intellectual and moral renaissance throughout the Islamic world. We shall deal with these weighty aspects of "Islam in Russia" in our next.

Persia.

News of the Week.

In reply to a detailed question by Colonel Yates asking for assurance that the Indian railway system gauge would be allowed to enter Ispahan and Yezd and that the Russian system gauge would not advance southward of those places and that the Russian proposal to run a railway to the Gulf would not be admitted, Mr Montagu said - "The Government reserved the fullest freedom of action on the question of gauge and other details. Regarding the gauge nothing irrevocable had occurred, and nothing would till they had consulted the Government of India on this most important point."

An article in the Economist condemns the Trans-Persian Railway as a most alarming design. The writer does not believe that it will go beyond the academic stage of preliminary survey.

The Military Correspondent of the Times says that soldiers are watching the project with increasing misgiving. He is of opinion that the scheme, if carried out, will cause a grave difference in the conditions of the defence of India. He complains that neither the Defence Committee, the General Staffs in India and England nor the military authorities at the India Office were consulted about the Railway.

The Aliabad Muhammadans have held a mass meeting to protest against the desecration of the shrines at Meshed by Russian soldiers.

The latest news received at the Persian Consulate at Simla is to the effect that the movements of Salar-ud-Dowlah after his recent defeat by the Imperial troops are unknown. Daud Khan, Chief of the Kalohor tribes, who was Salar-ud-Dowlah's right hand man, was killed in the fight. His death has deprived his chief of any chance of raising another revolt in those regions. Prince Firman Farma, who has been appointed Governor-General of Kermanshah, has restored order, and is now engaged in establishing effective administrative control. Since the escape of Salar-ud-Dowlah from Hashgai, Paighamud Doulah has been appointed Chief of the Kashgai tribe.

Major Peterson, Chief of the Swedish Gendarmerie, has now reported upon the recent encounter he had with a strong detachment of irregular troops, about which incorrect reports have appeared in this country. Major Peterson states that while returning from Shiraz he encountered a number of irregular horsemen at Murchalikhart near Ispahan. These men held up a caravan on the pretext of collecting toll, and in default were threatening to seize their merchandise. Major Peterson, finding that these men were not duly accredited by the Persian Government to collect revenues, captured them. News of this incident reached Hyder Ali Khan, Chief of these horsemen, and some of his relations immediately approached Major Peterson and demanded their release. Major Peterson having refused was attacked by the tribesmen. In the encounter there were several casualties. A relative of Hyder Khan was killed and one of his sons seriously wounded. Major Peterson, who had no casualties on his side, proceeded to Teheran and reported the matter to the Minister of the Interior.

Bunder Abbas is now comparatively quiet and no further news has been received of Hossain Haleh Khan, who was responsible for the recent disturbance in that region. The Governor-General of the Persian Gulf is taking steps to restore order in the Gulf littoral.

The Helplessness of Persia.

In a mailed message dated 4th May the Teheran correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung paints the situation in Persia in very sombre colours. "Persia," he says, "has been left with out money. The small sum of £200,000 which England and Russia advanced to the Persian Government has been absorbed by payments to Mohammed Ali and by the campaign against Salar-ud-Dowleh. The rest has been spent on the gendarmerie, which, however, is still far from being organised. There is no money for the further organisation of the force, and the Swedish officers, I hear, are already compelled to sell their barley (?) in order to meet their most urgent wants. The Persian Government has no money left for other needs. At the same time, there is again a deadlock in the negotiations for the big loan which was promised, and the only thing one hears in this connection is a report that the two Powers are contemplating the appointment of a mixed Commission to inquire into the loan question thoroughly. Yet the financial condition of Persia ought to be perfectly clear to the Powers—only there is no anxiety on either side to assist her. The lack of money has also an effect on trade, and the bazaar especially is quite as never before. The insecurity of the roads is also of great importance, as nothing can be sent from Teheran to the provinces. Some industries, formerly of considerable importance have been totally ruined."

The correspondent goes on to describe the political situation—the constant fears of the Regent, the continuing arrest of Democrats, the Russophile policy of Sardar Assad and the Sipahdar, and the impossibility, even if the wish were there, to hold elections to the Mejliss that would reflect the state of public opinion adequately. "Who," he asks, "among men of more or less independent opinions, would risk coming forward as candidate in face of the deportation which has befallen all those who in the previous Mejliss had spoken against Russia?"

In conclusion the correspondent touches upon the bombardment of the Meshhed mosque, denying that there were any revolutionaries in the sanctuary, and stating that the Russians have plundered the mosque and introduced their horses into the sacred building. "The Persian Government," he says, "is trying its best to conceal from the people the fact of the desecration of the sanctuary by the Russians. It fears that the news may raise a storm of indignation throughout the country, which will place Persia still more in the hands of the Russians, but at the same time certainly drive the present rulers from their places."

—The Manchester Guardian.

The Railway to India.

THE Near East—an excellent weekly review and compendium of Turkish and Persian news—prints in its first anniversary number an article by Mr. George Lloyd on the proposed railway from Russia through Persia to India. It is almost the first discussion that we have seen (outside our own columns) of this revolution in our Indian frontier policy. When Mr. Morrell asked a question about it of Sir E. Grey in Parliament this week, most papers (including the Times) thought fit to ignore both question and answer. Yet it was one of the most important questions asked in this Parliament. Mr. Morrell was anxious that the House of Commons should have an early opportunity of discussing the project, and Sir E. Grey replied that though there was no urgency at the present stage the question could be raised on any ordinary opportunity. He added that the project was not sufficiently far advanced as yet to enable the Government to put a proposal before the Persian Government or anyone. The answer, it seems to us, showed insufficient sense of the importance of the question or of the rights of Parliament. For the Government is not indifferent to the project, but has already discussed it in some detail with the Indian Government and possibly also with the promoters. It has given it sufficient encouragement to obtain for it the support of English capital, and Sir E. Grey as long ago as last February said that the Government was favourable in principle to the railway, provided certain conditions are observed. On the strength of these assurances a group of English, French, and Russian capitalists have subscribed £90,000 towards the expenses of a preliminary survey. We have no doubt that their report will be favourable to the construction of the line, and unless Parliament expresses a hostile opinion to the project before the survey is made and the report issued it will be told that the time is past for making objections in principle. Two more years of acquiescence and this country will be committed to a reversal of the established principles of Indian frontier defence, and to all that that momentous decision involves. A great revolution in our foreign and Indian policy will have been effected behind the back of Parliament at a series of private conferences between groups of civil servants and of international financiers. And Parliament will be even more to blame than the Foreign Office. It is in the nature of a bureaucracy always to be scorning its powers, but the chief safeguard of popular liberties against its usurpation has hitherto been the jealousy of Parliament. That honourable jealousy would seem to be somewhat somnolent. If it allows this railway project to go through without insisting on its rights to challenge the policy of it, Parliament has resigned its control alike of foreign and of Indian policy.

We say control, for the right of debate is useless if it is only exercised after the matter is settled beyond recall. For the consent of Parliament is not as a rule necessary to the validity of foreign conventions; all that it can do if a treaty is concluded which it dislikes is to throw out the Government and support a Government pledged to denounce it. In practice that is impossible, and the very magnitude of its executive powers in foreign affairs therefore puts Governments under constitutional obligation to take no revolutionary step in foreign policy, without satisfying itself of the opinion in Parliament. Parliamentary control means opportunities of debate before not after a policy is finally determined upon. No one would wish Parliament to interfere frequently in the Executive's exercise of its prerogative, but it is a condition of its forbearance that the prerogative should not be unreasonably strained. The project is misleadingly described—and the misdescription is perhaps not undesigned—as one for building a railway across Persia. But Persia is only the route. The primary object of the scheme is to establish railway communication between Russian and Indian territory. We have fought four wars in order to maintain strong independent States and impenetrable mountain passes and deserts between the Indian and Russian frontiers. No one ever suspected until a few months ago that this policy was in any sort of danger of being reversed, and it is surely by the strangest irony of fortune that a policy which all the military power and astute diplomacy of Russia has failed to break down should have been attacked with apparent success by a few international financiers meeting in Paris. The Government has been severely criticised for the failure of its Persian policy. Its answer to the criticism is to enlarge immeasurably the opportunities of Russian aggression. The Agreement is being worked so as to destroy Persian independence in the north. But lest the destruction should stop there, we are to take up the work and continue it in the south; and not content with jeopardising Persian liberties, we are to prolong the railway to India, and expose the frontier of India to a danger incomparably greater than any by which it has ever hitherto been threatened.

Why? No one can take the railway very seriously as a commercial venture. At any rate, whatever a land Power like Russia may have to gain by diverting the path of trade to the land, a maritime Power like England has to lose. Sir E. Grey holds that railways must be made sooner or later in Persia, and that we stand to gain by joining a movement which we cannot hope to defeat. But by what manner of right could Russia hope to continue her railway beyond Kermān, where it would enter the British sphere in Persia? Its further progress beyond that point would depend entirely on our consent. It would probably be in our commercial interest that the Trans-Persian line should be connected with the sea, and so be available for the transit of goods imported by the Gulf, but here the commercial arguments for its continuation disappear. Our obvious policy if there are markets in the British sphere of Persia which are worth opening up would be to construct railways into the interior from the most suitable port. But this proposed railway, after striking the sea, is to run alongside the coast towards India; it cannot therefore open up our own sphere in Persia, it can only provide trunk communication between Russia and India. Sir E. Grey seems to us to confuse two very distinct questions. The first is one of Indian frontier defence, to which, in our opinion, the proposed trunk railway will bring, not gain, but injury. The second is railway development in Persia, and this is wholly independent of through communication with India. The natural Power for us to work with in the construction of these railways is not Russia at all but Germany. If we have to gain anything at all from railways in Persia, the Bagdad railway and some short lines from the coast would give us everything that our commerce could wish, and that without in any way compromising Indian defence. But the project to which the Government is apparently sympathetic is Russian in its origin and Russian in the interests that it will serve. What is this strange necessity that seems to be upon us of always serving Russian interests even when they are in violent conflict with our own? —The Manchester Guardian.

Anecdote.

SUPERLATIVE SHE

AN after dinner speaker at a banquet in New York condemned the American snob.

"America is a Republic," he said. "We all began—even the mightiest of us—humbly and simply. When I hear one person snubbing another on grounds of birth the thing strikes me as ludicrous and unreal. It reminds me of a Mayflower girl."

"A girl of Mayflower descent yielded to the pinch of poverty sufficiently to marry a Grand Rapids millionaire. But her husband was a plebeian, and she would never forgive him for it. She would never cease from insulting him on account of his low origin."

"She was shopping one day, and a salesman said to her:—

"And to whom shall I send the parcel, madam?"

"With her nose in the air, she turned to her maid and said:—

"Marie, tell this man your master's name. I never can remember it myself."

MR. HEMMERDE, the well-known K. C., was once cross-examining a rather prominent man in a case that is memorable only for a brilliant retort made by counsel. Mr. Hemmerde pressed the witness so hard that at last he asked, rather plaintively:—

"Why should I be placed under the lash like this because my name is fairly well known?"

Instantly came Mr. Hemmerde's retort:—

"A man who is in the public eye must always be under the lash."

Morocco.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT)

Mogador, May 20

WE HAVE barely mastered the story of the Fez massacre and the occupation of that city by a French army corps, when a surprise comes from the south. It now seems certain that the rumours current a few days since are in substance correct. A son of the late redoubtable Sahara chieftain, Ma-ul-Amin, has taken possession of Tiznit, and proclaimed himself Sultan of the vast region extending from the slopes of the Great Atlas range to the Western Soudan. He appears to have captured the sympathies of a large number of the tribes by voicing the universal opposition to the Protectorate, and by declaring himself to be the Heaven-sent organiser of Holy War. His followers assure us that he and those under his command are invulnerable to the artillery of the infidel, and that he is to found a new dynasty, the one object of which will be to restore the ancient principles and glories of Islam.

The advent of this latest claimant to sovereign power is a serious matter. He has chosen the psychological moment for his enterprise. To say that Moulay Hafid, by his submission to France, has lost the loyalty of his people is to state the case much too moderately. His projected visit to Paris must inevitably sever the last link between him and his subjects. The government of the Sus provinces, the richest in all Morocco, has already slipped from the hands of the Maghzen, and no effort has hitherto been made by the Sultan or by France to recover control. It is now too late, except at the cost of a serious campaign, or of several campaigns. The territory ruled by the new Sultan covers an area, roughly speaking, of some 10,000 square miles—not much, perhaps, from an "imperial" point of view, but quite large enough to afford lively occupation for a European army corps for several months.

(FROM REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

MOGADOR AND TANGIER

The newly proclaimed Sultan, Ma-ul-Amin, has sent an army to Tarudant under the leadership of his brother and another to Marrakesh. He is himself going to Agadir. The Tanawart and Haha tribes, having secretly adhered to Ma-ul-Amin, are awaiting his arrival. The Sus country is tranquil under the new regime.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 24

The new French Resident-General in Morocco, General Lyautey, has provisionally expressed the opinion that additional reinforcements will be needed, and the Government has decided to despatch them as soon as he is able to form an estimate of the requirements on the spot. It is believed that this fresh contingent will number about 4,000 men. Including the troops of General Lyautey's escort, the strength of the Fez garrison now amounts to five battalions, in addition to artillery and cavalry. The Temps learns that the rebel tribes, which are attempting to encircle the capital in much the same way as last year, appear to have succeeded on the east and in the south, and are now extending their movement to the west and north.

In a fresh interview with a representative of the Matin at Fez, Moulay Hafid has repeated his determination to abdicate. The Temps this evening expresses the hope that General Lyautey will be able to bring him to a better frame of mind.

In the Chamber of Deputies to-day the Prime Minister announced that the Protectorate Treaty with Morocco had been submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee for a report, and proposed that it should be taken together with a number of fresh interpellations on French policy of which notice has been given.

Fez, May 24

General Lyautey arrived here this afternoon. El Mokri the Sultan's representative, went to meet him two miles outside the city and gave a luncheon in his honour on behalf of the Sultan.

M. Regnault, the French Special Envoy, arrived at 3 o'clock and had a long private interview with General Lyautey. Then a procession was formed and started to enter the Capital. French troops lined the route. Many natives were present and the strong force of soldiers visibly impressed them. The French colours waved over the gates of Fez. The Sultan will receive General Lyautey to-morrow.

An attack on Fez was attempted last night by some hundreds of Moors, but was easily repulsed—Reuter.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, May 24

Prominence is given to-night in a section of the Berlin Press to a story telegraphed from Tangier to the Echo de Paris and forwarded here to the effect that two of the well-known brothers

Mannesmann have been imprisoned at Tarudant by the adherents of the pretender Hiba. The only thing alleged to be known here in responsible quarters is that "two Germans" have been captured at Tarudant and that the German Government has already made an application to the French Government and to the German Minister at Tangier for their protection. Two of the brothers Mannesmann are said to be at present at Casablanca, and the firm in Westphalia has received nothing to-day to confirm the story of the capture of the other two.

[* Tarudant is one of the principal towns in the province of Sus, and is situated about 50 miles due east of Agadir. The Mannesmann brothers have mining concessions in that region.]

Tangier, May 26

At dawn this morning Fez was attacked simultaneously on all sides by tribesmen who succeeded in one quarter of the town in penetrating within the walls. Fighting took place all the morning, but by midday the enemy had been repulsed and the French troops were pursuing them in the open country outside the city, inflicting heavy losses. The last news states that all is tranquil and that the tribesmen have dispersed.

Paris, May 26

The new French Resident-General in Morocco, General Lyautey, had his first official audience of the Sultan at Fez yesterday. In the course of the interview both M. Regnault and General Lyautey addressed Moulay Hafid and assured him of the French Government's desire to carry out the mission of France in Morocco with due respect for existing instructions and traditions. The Sultan replied by expressing confidence in the ability of France to accomplish the task and by assuring General Lyautey of his personal goodwill.

While the military situation around Fez remains unchanged, General Girardot's Algerian column has crossed over on to the left bank of the Muluva river at Merada ford. Considerable importance is attached to this advance.

Tangier, May 27

The attack of the tribesmen on Fez began shortly before midnight on 25th May, and by dawn they had succeeded in entering the eastern portion of the town, where the walls and fortifications are half ruined. The situation was described as being at that moment very serious, and the French Artillery were obliged to bombard the quarter of the city in which the rebels had gained a footing. It was not till near midday on the 26th that the French troops succeeded in driving off the hordes of tribesmen, who were pursued for some distance outside the walls.

Paris, May 27

In view of the attack by Berbers on Fez yesterday morning, the Minister of War has decided to despatch without further delay additional reinforcements consisting of three battalions of Infantry, two squadrons of Cavalry, and one mountain battery—in all about 4,000 men. This force will be ready to sail in a few days. The number of casualties on the French side in yesterday's attack has not yet been ascertained, but so far it is believed that only a few men have been wounded.

Circumstantial reports current to-day to the effect that General Girardot's camp on the Muluva had been rushed by 10,000 tribesmen are denied. It is stated that General Girardot's column, after crossing on to the left bank of the river and occupying Gueriff, is advancing towards the heights of Bu Yakubat, whence the French troops, when they have dislodged the hostile tribes, will command the route to Taza.

The Temps learns from Fez that General Lyautey's arguments have so far failed to shake Moulay Hafid's determination to abdicate, and that the Sultan is anxious to leave Fez for Rabat, together with M. Regnault, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made.

LATER.

It seems that there was some truth in the reports circulated in Paris to-day with regard to the attack on General Girardot's column. The estimate of the French losses, however, was grossly exaggerated, since in the engagement which did take place, between the tribesmen and the French column, it is officially stated that the French losses only amounted to two killed and ten wounded. In spite of the repulse of the Berbers in their attack on Fez, it seems probable that they may rally and make another assault on the town.

Paris, May 28

At a Ministerial Council to-day, under the presidency of M. Fallières, M. Poincaré communicated the latest despatches from the French Resident-General in Morocco, who reports that the rebel attack on Fez has been repulsed and that the enemy has been driven off with heavy loss. The War Minister stated that the fresh reinforcements would consist of two battalions of colonial infantry, one battalion of tirailleurs, two squadrons of spahis, and two mountain batteries. The total strength of the French forces in Morocco will thus be raised to 47,000 men.

In the Parliamentary preamble to the Protectorate Treaty, which has now been submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber the French Government declares that this instrument has been drawn up on lines similar to those of the Franco-Tunisian Conventions of 1881 and 1883, and that every effort has been made to secure the complete elasticity of the new régime with due regard for existing institutions and international obligations. It is explained that "we had to take account of the obligations which are imposed upon us by our international agreements as well as of the rights which these agreements formally confer upon us. We have endeavoured clearly to assert our determination to respect the former and to exercise the latter."

Tangier, May 28.

A telegram from Fez of to-day's date states that the tribes in considerable force are again attacking the town.

Berlin, May 28

A telegram to the Cologne Gazette from Tangier, dated 27th May, states that nothing is known either at the Ministry at Tangier or by the representatives there of the Mannesmann firm regarding the reported capture of two of the brothers Mannesmann at Tarudant.

Tangier, May 29

The rebels, reinforced by large tribal contingents, including inhabitants of the districts immediately surrounding the town, renewed their attack upon Fez yesterday and fighting continued nearly the whole day. It is now believed that the rebel forces besieging the capital number at least 20,000. Although the garrison of Fez consists of only some 6,000 French troops, these are considered sufficient to hold the town, but, of course, no offensive operations can be undertaken before the reinforcements arrive. The situation is undoubtedly grave.

Paris, May 29.

The extracts from the latest despatches from Fez which are published this evening suggest that the town is once more on the point of being invested by the rebel tribes. No direct news has been received from General Lyautey since his message, transmitted at 7.30 P.M. yesterday, in which the Resident-General stated that in view of the agitation among the tribes a fresh attack on Fez was, perhaps, to be feared.

There has been no official confirmation of the reports to the effect that the rebels had already returned to the charge, but it is significant of the apprehensions which are entertained that rumours of the wildest character should be current in Paris and in other capitals. In Madrid, for example, people are being asked to believe that General Lyautey and M. Regnault have been killed and that there has been a wholesale massacre of French troops.

The French garrison, which has just been reinforced by a mixed battalion from Mekinez, is now 4,500 strong, and is considered to be capable of keeping the enemy at bay without much difficulty. On the other hand the Berbers during the recent fighting appear to have forced their way into the town at various points. Fortunately the native population has hitherto remained quiet. According to a French Agency telegram from Fez, dated yesterday and retransmitted from Tangier at noon to-day, the fusillade is incessant, but there had until then been no fresh attack in force. The spirit of the troops is described as excellent.

The rising may gradually flicker out, but in his latest despatch General Lyautey is said to have made it plain that for the moment the French are waging war in an enemy's country. General Lyautey has lost no time in assembling the Kaida, Ulema, and other notabilities at Fez, in order to explain the working of the new Protectorate régime with regard to which there appears to have been a serious misunderstanding in the native mind.

The despatch of the reinforcements from Lorient, Lyons, Nîmes, Toulon, Algeria and Tunis is being expedited.

Berlin, May 29

The report of the imprisonment at Tarudant of the brothers Mannesmann by adherents of the pretender Hiba appears to have no foundation. The Cologne Gazette publishes to-day a telegram from Rameisheid, where there is a branch office of the Mannesmann Mining Syndicate, to the effect that in response to inquiries the Mannesmann brothers have telegraphed there to say that none of them is in captivity.

Paris, May 30

A long despatch from General Lyautey which was sent from Fez at 6 P.M. yesterday and which was received at the Foreign Office early this morning makes it clear that the French are faced with a serious situation both at Fez and throughout the country. Sunday's attack on the town, in the course of which, according to unofficial reports, the French are said to have lost 38 killed and some 60 officers and men wounded, is described as one of the severest engagements that they have had to fight in Morocco. A fresh attack, during which the French casualties were five killed and eight wounded, was made on Tuesday, and after a lull during the night fighting was resumed yesterday.

The rebels are said to have been repulsed on each occasion with heavy loss, but there appears to have been some desperate street-fighting on Tuesday night in the eastern quarter of the town, where several hundred Berbers had succeeded in forcing an entrance. As reported in my telegram yesterday, the calculations of the rebels were defeated by the fact that the native population remained quiet. The influence of the Ulema, whom General Lyautey had previously interviewed, seems to have been decisive in this sense. At dawn yesterday Colonel Gouraud's mobile column, eight companies strong, which has been employed in keeping the rebels as far as possible on the move, was sent out to reconnoitre the region north of Fez and sighted detachments of rebels assembled about six miles away. A fresh battalion and an ammunition convoy were expected to arrive from Mekinez last night.

General Lyautey, who praises the splendid spirit of the troops during this trying week, considers that the local situation is for the moment easier, but that the general situation demands serious attention in view of the deep-rooted causes of unrest and the continued presence of the rebels in the field.

The Sultan, who was much alarmed while the attack was in progress on Tuesday evening, became calmer as reassuring news was brought in. General Lyautey, who had been invited to luncheon at the Palace yesterday, informs the French Government that he proposes to adopt in concert with the Sultan, various political measures which, in his opinion, are opportune. The object of these measures is to manifest to the loyal and influential section of the native population the satisfaction of the French authorities at their friendly attitude. General Lyautey will likewise endeavour to break up the understanding among the tribes. Apart from these special measures General Lyautey is taking steps to restore, at any rate in its externals, the authority of the Maghzen and of the Grand Vizier.

At a meeting of the Cabinet to-day the Prime Minister communicated this morning's despatch from General Lyautey, which, as is stated this evening, has been published in full in order to preclude any misunderstanding and to prevent the dissemination of false news. It is further announced that the Minister of Justice will institute an inquiry "with regard to the false news which has been published concerning Morocco and with regard to Bourse speculations to which these reports have given rise."

Fez, May 30, 6.5 p.m.

Tribesmen attacked Fez to-day, the attack lasting from 10 A.M. to 2 P.M. They were eventually repulsed by heavy rifle followed by bayonet charges. Six French soldiers were wounded. The rebels suffered considerable losses.

Tangier, May 30

Letters received to-day from Fez state that the Europeans passed a most anxious time during the attack of the Berber tribes upon the capital on the night of 25th and 26th May. The attack began shortly after 10 o'clock, and the firing was continuous all night, while so near were the tribesmen that their shouting and warlike cries were clearly audible. It was known that they had forced an entry into the town at various points, but nothing else could be learned, and the Europeans sat waiting in their Consulates, listening to the terrible noise and not knowing what would occur next. It is believed that a certain number of tribesmen remain in Fez, but the Europeans are confined to their respective Consulates and are unable to leave the Consulate quarter, where French troops are on guard. It was most fortunate that after the massacre of the French officers the population was disarmed, as otherwise doubtless the more turbulent portion would have joined the rebels, with terrible consequences.

The whole rising is anti-French and Europeans of all other nationalities have been assured by messengers from the tribesmen that neither they nor their property will be touched. But whatever may be the intentions of the tribesmen, the risk to all Europeans would be enormous if they forced an entry into the town. Fighting is reported to be continuing daily in the region of Fez and another attack upon the town is expected at any moment.

The Revolt in Morocco.

(FROM A "MORNING POST" PARIS CORRESPONDENT.)

THE opposition of the French Socialists and others to the Moroccan adventure is already justified by the events. The rising in Fez, accompanied by the murder of foreigners and the mutiny of some of the native troops under French command, is a symptom of the feeling in the country. It is stated that the rising was organised by several prominent Moroccans, including Ould ben Mohamed, an uncle of the Sultan, the inhabitants of Morocco are clearly not prepared tamely to accept a "protectorate" to which Europe has agreed without consulting them. Official optimism, which disregarded the warning of the coming rising, may continue to minimise the difficulties of the task which awaits France in Morocco; but it is plain to every unbiased person that Morocco will have to be conquered by force of arms if the French protectorate is to be made effective. The Sultan has submitted, and it is said that he is loyal to France, but there is every sign that the people will not follow him. The popular movement is taking the form of a movement against foreigners in general, resistance to the invasion of the infidels has already assumed a religious character.

That the French Government has abandoned the pretence of "peaceful penetration" is shown by the appointment of General Lyautey to be Resident General in Morocco in place of M. Regnault, who is to be given a diplomatic post in Europe. If a general had to be chosen for the position, the choice of General Lyautey is as good a one as could be made, but the criticism of the appointment in that portion of the press which still retains some regard for Republican principles is as natural as the acclamation with which it has been received by the Nationalists and all the advocates of a "spirited policy." Nothing pleases the Nationalists more than the appointment of military men to civil functions, and this is not the first time that they have had occasion to be pleased with the present Government. M. Millerand, since he became Minister of War, has devoted all his energies to the revival of militarism and chauvinism, of the spirit which led to the Dreyfus affair.

It must, however, be admitted that the appointment of General Lyautey is justified by the logic of facts. France has embarked on a war of conquest, and wars must be conducted by generals, not by diplomatists. Many of those who protest against the appointment are responsible for the situation which has made it necessary. Had they joined the Socialists in making a strong stand against the enterprise into which France has been dragged by the speculations of financiers, they might have succeeded in stopping it. When Radical Ministers, with the acquiescence of the Radical party, sanctioned the expedition to Fez, they made themselves responsible for its inevitable consequences. It is idle now to protest against those consequences. On the whole it is better that the real nature of the Moroccan adventure should be made plain to the country at large. It remains to be seen how deeply the political reaction has penetrated and whether M. Millerand's new Boulangism has really taken hold on the country. If, as I believe, the heart of France is still sound we may expect sooner or later a popular movement against the present policy.

This is the more likely to be the case since the effect of this policy is already being felt outside Morocco. There is serious unrest in Tunis, which will not be appeased by the recent arbitrary expulsion of several members of the "Young Tunisian" party, against which even the Temps has protested. The only reason alleged for their expulsion was that they had raised a fund for assisting Turkey in the war with Italy. From this fact it was deduced that they were plotting to transfer Tunis from France to Turkey. The absurdity of such a charge would be evident even if the "Young Tunisians" were not, as they are, men who have received a French education and are strong partisans of the spread of the French language and culture among their fellow-countrymen. One of the chief reforms that they advocate is the teaching of the French language in all Tunisian schools, the opposition to this reform comes from French colonists and officials, who wish to keep the Tunisians in ignorance in order to maintain them in subservience. The "Young Tunisians," who are not in the least anti-French, might be most useful as a link between their fellow-countrymen and the French authorities. They are the intellectuals among the Tunisians, many of them have taken degrees in the French University and have been called to the Bar or entered other professions. Their proposals are most moderate and a reasonable Government would give them favourable attention.

Events in Tunis are inevitably beginning to have an effect on public feeling in Algeria. Indeed, unless a different policy is soon adopted France is likely to have difficulties with all its Muhammadan populations. A great Muhammadan Power like England cannot be indifferent to the unrest which has been caused by the action of France and Italy in Africa.

The Situation in Morocco.

It will surprise no one who has read our recent despatches on Morocco that General Lyautey has already expressed a desire for further reinforcements. It is believed, our Paris Correspondent tells us, that 4,000 men will be despatched; but the strength of the contingent will no doubt depend upon the tenor of letter advices from General Lyautey, who only entered Fez yesterday. Mulai Hafid's reported determination to abdicate is a disquieting feature of the situation, especially when the appearance of a new Pretender in the south is testifying to the existence of widespread unrest; and the outlook is not improved by the report that this Pretender has captured two Germans, who may or may not be the Mannesmann brothers, but who, at any rate, have been found in the district coveted by the Mannesmann claims. Whatever may prove to be the truth regarding this episode, there can be no doubt that the activities of Sid Muhammad Hiba, the claimant in question, requires to be dealt with at once. His father, the late Mal' Afria, magician and religious leader in the Sahara, wielded considerable influence, but his sanctity was attained in regions too remote to become dangerous to Europeans.

Descent from so holy a personage is doubtless the source and the mainstay of his son's ambitions. There can be no mistake about their extent. He has assumed the Imperial seal and all the customary titles of a Sultan, and by so doing, he proclaims war to the death against the lawful occupant of the throne, his aiders and abettors. His immediate prospects depend upon the attitude of the great Kads of the south, who exercise immense authority and influence over their tribesmen. According to our Tangier Correspondent's information, Haj Thami Glawi, the greatest of them all and the head of the powerful Glawi faction, remains true to the cause of Mulai Hafid, notwithstanding the serious personal grievances which he and his family cherish against that potentate and the Maghzen. This is the more remarkable to observers of Moslem politics because he was dismissed last year from the post of Basha of Marakesh to make way for a worthless and incapable stranger. All the other important Kads, our correspondent says, seem to be either openly or secretly in relations with the Pretender; and, if this be the case, Haj Thami's loyalty can hardly prove an effectual bulwark against the insurrection, unless the French are able to give him the immediate support for which he is looking. Doubtless, they will strain every effort to cut short the career of the holy man in its first stage, mindful of the decisive result of initial events in the history of such personages. If the champion of the Faith is promptly beaten, the tribesmen who are now flocking to his standard will be satisfied that the hand of Heaven is not with him, and they will hasten back to their harvest operations, which are now, fortunately, due. But should he gain anything which can be represented as a victory over the unbelievers and their supporters, he may speedily become the spiritual and the temporal head of all the discontented in Morocco.

There are, it cannot be doubted, plenty of discontented there. Were this not the case, the vocation to the Throne would hardly have come upon the Pretender just now, and the tribes would not be taking up arms in so many regions at a wide distance from each other. Their dissatisfaction is, of course, the outcome of no single cause. National feeling and religious feeling contribute to it and give it a decent cloak, but we imagine that it would not have become so serious as it is without more material grounds. Our Tangier Correspondent has repeatedly stated that grounds of the kind exist, at all events, in certain parts of the country. Abuses, he affirms, have grown up in regard to the ownership of lands. Native chiefs, and, what is worse, French citizens, have been suffered to repay themselves for their services to the French cause by extortion and by seizing and holding the lands of natives. So long ago as March our correspondent warned us that hostility to French influence would continue to grow until these abuses were suppressed and reparation made for the wrongs already done. The prediction was easy for anybody who knows our own experience in all our African possessions and in India. Machiavelli exhorted his Prince rather to make away with subjects who were his enemies than to confiscate their estates, for, he sententiously remarks, men will rather forget the murder of a father than the loss of their inheritance. The doctrine certainly applies to-day to most half-civilized peoples who live by agriculture, whether it was or was not, true of the society of which it was written. There is nothing peoples of the kind resent so intensely as tampering with their agrarian rights and customs and nothing which so surely fills them all with suspicion. They feel that if one man's lands are unsafe, all men's lands are unsafe, and, as their land is literally their living, they will go almost any lengths to defend it. The abuses were admittedly committed in the absence of M. Regnault, whose rectitude is as incontestable as is his ability, and they may have been relatively few. But even a single instance of the disregard of the accepted title to land is enough to disturb the minds of a neighbourhood, and half a dozen will demoralize a region. Precise and solemn pledges from the highest and the best-known authorities are probably the only immediate step which can be taken to mitigate the ill results of past mistakes, but full faith will hardly be given them until the lands which have been misappropriated are restored to their owners, or full compensation has been paid. Military measures, on an inconveniently large scale, are indispensable, we fear, against the insurgents, but their magnitude will largely depend upon the judgment formed by the tribesmen of the relations between their secular and their spiritual interests. We trust that the movement may not be so grave as in some quarters it is represented to be. It is, however, manifestly serious, and it is not yet fully developed. It may collapse with the advent of the harvest, or it may have to be "smashed" by long and costly operations. The end, of course, is certain, but in the interests of Europe, as well as of Morocco, we must all desire that it be not deferred.—The Times.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wired from Rome on the 13th June —The Turks and Arabs yesterday surprised the Italians at Homs whereupon the Italians made counterattacks on their flanks and rear with all available force cutting the Turks into two bodies, routing one and surrounding and annihilating the other at the oasis. 421 bodies were found and there were many other Turkish dead on the line of flight. Italian losses were two officers and 29 men killed and two officers and 57 men wounded.

Sir Edward Grey in reply to Sir E. Coates said: "The question of pilgrim traffic in the Red Sea had already occupied the serious attention of the Government. Earlier in the year the Government expressed to the Italian Government the hope that every consideration consistent with the necessities of war would be shown to pilgrim ships and that any measures Italy might take in those waters would not in any way hamper pilgrim traffic. Italy replied that she would keep carefully in view the requirements of the traffic and that she was fully conscious of the necessity of not impeding it."

The British Red Crescent Society's supplemental mission of three doctors and five male nurses with equipment and stores left for Tripoli on the 12th instant.

The Italians have landed a fresh expedition at Hushaifa, 60 miles to the east of Tripoli.

Rumours appear to have been going about India that a certain number of Arabs or other Mahammadans have left Bombay for the purpose of taking part on the Turkish side in the Tripoli war. As a matter of fact, so far as can be ascertained, not a single Mahammadan has done so.

The Raagoon branch of the Indian Red Crescent Society on the 19th instt forwarded a remittance of Rs 500 by cable to London.

The Italian Government has now ordered all Italians, including sisters of charity, doctors, and orphans, to leave Turkey. These instructions are interpreted as portending more vigorous action against Turkey.

A thousand Italians left on the 18th June. No demonstration occurred. The total now expelled from Constantinople is ten thousand.

The following resolutions were unanimously passed at a general meeting of the Muhammadans of Calcutta under the auspices of the Anjuman Moim-ul-Islam on the 14th June 1912.—

I. That the Muhammadans of Bengal are deeply touched and distressed to hear of the repeated aggression against the Muslim countries by foreign Powers and consider it their duty to most earnestly beg of the Government of India to permit them to go there as volunteers and thus justify the strong bond which unites the Muhammadans all over the world.

II. That a complete list of the Russian and Italian goods imported into India be prepared and published broadcast all over India, and the Muhammadans should solemnly take an oath to boycott these goods and thus in a small measure express their protest and indignation at the unrighteous and brutal aggression of these Powers against Muslim countries.

News by the English Mail.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 27.

ACCORDING to a report received at the Ministry of War, the fortifications of Barka, west of Ben Ghazi, have been captured by the Turkish forces, who hope to secure the town.

A letter from Kalymnos says that the Italians, after landing, handed over the administration of the island to the Municipal Council, which is composed almost entirely of Greeks. The Turkish officials are being deported as prisoners of war. When the Italians withdrew they left no garrison. The Italians are apparently endeavouring to stimulate the Greek national spirit among the inhabitants of the various islands.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Chios May 25.

ITALIAN destroyers have visited the two ports, Lithia and Karmathia, on the west and north side of the island respectively, on the last two mornings and taken soundings. Both places have a good harbour and fresh water supply.

The captain of a Greek ship coming from the Dardanelles reports having sighted a Turkish fleet of 12 vessels between Lemnos and Chios. The Turkish troops on the island, numbering

1,300, are well supplied with ammunition and food, the monasteries being used as storehouses. Several Christian soldiers have already deserted. Many young Greek and Ottoman subjects have left the island to evade service with the Turkish colours.

The suspense of the present position and uncertainty as to the ultimate fate of the island has brought business to a standstill.

Athens, May 26.

THE following semi-official statement is published here —

"In reply to an inquiry from the Communal Council of Kalymnos Admiral Presbytero states that, in accordance with instructions from the Italian Government, vessels of the islands are to fly the Italian flag. Italian stamps are to be used for correspondence for abroad and local stamps for correspondence between the islands. All Turkish goods will be subjected to a duty of 11 per cent. Greek goods will enter duty free."—Reuter.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Athens, May 30.

THE prolonged delay in the Italian occupation of Chios gives rise to much speculation. It is stated that fresh troops from Tobruk will be employed, and that the arrangements for their transport require some time, while a portion of the troops employed in the operations at Rhodes will remain to garrison that island. The explanation, however, seems insufficient, and I have reason to believe that the postponement is due to difficulties of a diplomatic character. Obstacles to the prosecution of the Italian programme have latterly presented themselves, originating, it would seem, in the bosom of the Triple Alliance. Whether Italy will consent to successive limitations of her field of action involving the protraction of a costly war in order to suit the convenience of her friends remains to be seen. It is certain at least that her operations in the Aegean have received a temporary check.

The fate of the islands already occupied by Italy excites much concern here. It is anticipated that should the islands be handed back to Turkey at the end of the war the inhabitants may be subjected to reprisals owing to the enthusiasm with which they have welcomed the Italians. Twelve of the smaller islands adjacent to Rhodes, known as the Dodekanessa, received complete autonomy under various firmans dating from 1645 and ratified at subsequent periods, but all their privileges have been suppressed in recent years. It is urged that those privileges should at least be restored under a guarantee of the Powers.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENTS)

Athens, May 24.

ACCORDING to a statement semi-officially published here, Shevket Pasha, the Turkish Minister of War, has announced his intention of again closing the Dardanelles if the Italians occupy Chios (Scio) or Mytilene, from which a raid might easily be made upon the straits. The statement goes on to say that he will do this irrespective of the opinion of the other Ministers, on the ground that he alone is responsible for the national defence.

Berlin, May 24.

WITH reference to reports from Rome that Russia is about to take further steps to secure the intervention of the Powers to bring about the close of hostilities in the Mediterranean, it is pointed out in a well-informed quarter here that the reclosing of the Dardanelles as a result of Italian activity in the Aegean is a possibility of the situation.

In the representations to the Porte which caused the reopening of the Strait, Russia took the standpoint that it was unnecessary that they should be closed to neutral shipping so long as the Italians were at Rhodes, 36 hours' steaming away, as there would always be time to close them and sow mines in the passage before they could be attacked. If the Italians proceed to occupy more northern islands—for instance, Mytilene, which is only a few hours distant—this argument loses validity. It is believed in that case that the Turks intend to close the Dardanelles, and keep them closed so long as the Italians are within striking distance.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

ONE of the Temps correspondents is in a position to divulge the nature of the agreement arrived at in 1904 at Bacconigi between the Russian and Italian Governments. No special treaty was concluded, but the following understanding was arrived at:—"The two Governments declare that their interest in the Balkans are not antagonistic to each other, but are in either case antagonistic to those of Austria-Hungary, and consequently of Germany, as shown by the Bosnian crisis of 1908. In face of these facts the two Governments, as represented by their respective Sovereigns and Ministers, concluded an entente cordiale having for its object the mutual safeguarding of their interests in the Near East and common opposition to the encroachments of the two mid-European Powers.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, May 24.

TWO causes of Nail Bey's resignation are becoming somewhat clear. It appears that while the extremist elements in the Committee reproached him with "undue deference" to the demands of the French financiers, with whom he has long been in negotiation, the influences behind the Minister of War were steadily opposed to his efforts on behalf both of economy and of a more thorough control of military expenditure by the Accountant-General department. Faced by the increasing hostility of a section of his own party and of the soldiers, and harassed by ill-health, the Minister had no alternative but to resign. His successor, who has not yet been appointed, is likely to find his path beset with the same difficulties.

Constantinople May 28.

ALTHOUGH reports are current of the imminence of further Ministerial changes, politicians here appear too doubtful about the precise state of the feeling of the Committee of Union and Progress outside the capital to hazard a prophecy. The final decision in any such changes is likely to be taken by the Central Committee whose headquarters remain at Salonika.

News From Turkish Sources.

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF THE 15TH MAY 1912.)

THE day before yesterday the Grand Vizier received a visit from the ex-Grand Vizier, Hakkı Pasha, with whom he conversed for a long time.

A commission met yesterday at the Ministry of War under the presidency of Mahmoud Chevkeli Pasha. The members of the Commission of the Hedjaz Railway and Adil Bey, Councillor to the Grand Vizierat also assisted at the deliberations. The Commission met to study the project of the construction of a metalled road to the Hedjaz. A definite decision is expected to be reached at the next sitting.

We are informed that the new Admiral of the Ottoman fleet has prepared a project for the complete reorganisation of the fleet on the British model. The project in question is under consideration at the Ministry of Marine and will very shortly be submitted to the Council of Ministers.

An Italian Officer writes to the Ragione that the reconnaissances made by the Italian aviators have revealed the presence of important Arab contingents in Cyrenaïque. These reinforcements have come from the south of Egypt.

We are informed from an authoritative source that the military preparations of Russia which have been talked of so much lately are measures taken by the Russian Government to reinforce the Caucasus garrison from fear of an insurrection of Persian revolutionaries. That these measures indicate no offensive attitude towards Turkey was the object of the assurances given the other day by M. Sassanof to our Ambassador, Turkhan Pasha.

(FROM THE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT "JEUNE TURC")

Cairo, May 16.

In spite of its declaration of neutrality, Egypt does not escape vexatious treatment at the hands of the Italians. Their men-of-war lying in the offing at Alexandria and Port Said stop the Egyptian boats and, though the papers of the latter prove their nationality, they are yet searched and often watched as if they had been captured in war. The Italians argue that all this is due to the boats flying the Turkish flag. They demand that the Egyptian boats should fly the Khedivial flag of three crescents and stars which is hoisted on the yachts and palaces of the Khedive when His Highness is in residence. The Egyptian Government favours this idea and has advised the owners of the Egyptian vessels, which are plying their trade in spite of the Italian surveillance, to fly the new flag—of which, however, there is no mention in the Firman. The public opinion interprets this advice in another sense, for it is understood to indicate the desire of our Government to find means of emphasising its separate, political existence.

Al-Ahram has raised the cry of alarm and puts the ship-owners on guard against their falling into the trap that has been laid for them. The newspaper in question advises them to abstain from navigation so long as the war lasts rather than hoist a flag other than that of the Ottoman Empire. Lately, one of the coast-guarding vessels was seen entering the roadsteads of Alexandria under a new flag which was a mixture of the Ottoman ensign and the Union Jack. The ostensible pretext was that the vessel wanted to shield herself against attacks from the Italians. I know not whether our Government is bent upon following this new political line, but this much is certain that the public opinion is emphatic in expressions of loyalty to the Ottoman Empire.

His Highness the Khedive leaves Alexandria on the 16th instant on his annual visit to the shores of the Bosphorus and to Europe. The Khedive's consort, the Heir-Apparent, and other princes will not accompany His Highness. They will pass the summer at Moutazah near Alexandria. His Highness will be accompanied by his second wife, Gavidane Khanem (ex-Countess of Teurec), who will go with him to Europe also. His Highness's mother has already left Egypt for the Bosphorus and has probably already taken up residence at her palace at Bebek. The remaining behind of the Khediviah and the princess is unusual and is much commented upon.

The Council of Ministers met at the Vizierat yesterday and discussed the following questions.—

(1) The opening of the Dardanelles.—The Council was put au courant with telegrams from the Commandant of Dardanelles regarding the work of clearing the mines. According to these telegrams the straits will be opened on Friday or on Saturday at the latest.

(2) The military preparations of Russia.—The Council also discussed the military preparations of Russia in the Caucasus. Nassim Bey, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, submitted to the Council the telegrams received from our Ambassador, Turkhan Pasha. In the course of its deliberations the Council demanded by telegraph some more explanations from our Ambassador at St. Petersburg. We have already said that assurances given by M. Sassanof to Turkhan Pasha were considered satisfactory, but in consequence of the information received that the new mobilisation at Moscow is intended to augment the effective strength of Russia in the Caucasus, we have reason to believe that fresh explanations will be demanded by our Ambassador.

(3) The situation in Albania.—Talaat Bey, Officiating Minister of the Interior, read the telegrams received from the Valis of Cossovo and Scutari in Albania. The telegrams were very assuring.

(4) Foreign Politics.—Nassim Bey laid on the table the despatches received from our Ambassadors, regarding the attitude of Powers on the question of the Italo-Turkish war. These despatches refer to many indications of the sympathy of the great Powers for Turkey.

(5) Administrative questions.—The Council also discussed the current affairs of the Empire, and certain other projects which will shortly be submitted for the approval of the Lower House.

(6) The concession for the new lines of the tramways in the capital.—The decision of the Council of the State regarding the concession of the new lines was approved and sent up for Imperial sanction. The Military preparations of Russia, in spite of the declarations of the official Russian press, pre-occupy the foreign and Ottoman political circles. According to a rumour which is going the round with persistence, General Alexandrowitch, the Commandant of the Cossacks at Moscow, has received orders to leave for the Caucasus. Till a late hour yesterday we had no information to confirm this rumour.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF THE 17TH MAY 1912.)

The Agence Ottomane has received from the Minister of War a copy of telegram from Enver Bey, Commandant of Benghazi, who wires as follows.—

"The day before yesterday one of our detachments which had been placed in ambush opened fire on a detachment of the enemy on the latter's coming out of the forts to take part in the work of the construction of the fortifications at Tobruk. Vexed by our fire, the Italians responded badly, all their shots going over our heads. They had 20 killed and 35 wounded, while our detachment suffered no loss. In the morning an aeroplane dropped several bombs on our camp at Derna and fortunately did not injure any one. At Benghazi a detachment of the enemy guided by an Arab scout advanced in our direction; it suddenly collided with our patrol, and took to flight immediately, abandoning the scout. The latter has been shot. I am happy to announce to you that in all our small engagements lately we have not lost a single man."

We learn from an authorised source that the new explanations given by the Russian Government to our Ambassador, Turkhan Pasha, on the subject of the recent movements of Russian troops to the Caucasus have been considered satisfactory by the Ottoman Government.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF THE 18TH MAY.)

The Selamlık of yesterday was held in the Mosque Techvikie at Nisantacha. The Sheikhul Islam, the Ministers of War and Evkaf and many other high dignitaries assisted at the ceremony. The Duke of Orleans and Breganza and Mr. Pears, the English author, were amongst the spectators. His Imperial Majesty charged his first Chamberlain, Loufi Bey with transmitting his salutations to the distinguished visitors. After the Selamlık the Ministers of War and Marine and Damad Sifit Bey were received in audience by the Sultan.

Our Siope correspondent wires to us that five Russian torpedo boats were seen the other day very near the coast with all their lights out. The boats in question seemed to be engaged in night manoeuvres and have left for Kerich.

A ministerial reunion was held yesterday at the Konak of the Grand Vizier, His Highness presiding. The Ministers were principally engaged with some events which have no connection with the war. All the telegrams received yesterday from our Embassies abroad and from the Tripolitaine, the Archipelago and from the Valis of Kossovo and Scutari were the subject of ministerial deliberations.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF THE 19TH MAY 1912.)

News came to hand very late yesterday of the accident to the Minister of War, Mahmoud Chevket Pasha. His Excellency, who was carrying on an inspection at Scutari, was thrown by his horse and has injured his leg. The injury is very slight and the Minister returned to the War Office and is engaged in his ordinary duties.

Our St Petersburg correspondent telegraphs that news has been received there almost simultaneously from London and Constantinople regarding the new Ottoman Loan and the Anglo-Turkish particulars that are being carried on the question of Koweit and the terminus of the Baghdad Railway. These questions, it is said, will shortly be settled to the satisfaction of both parties. This news has produced a great sensation in political circles and in the Press and is supposed to indicate a difference of opinion on the Near Eastern politics between England and France grouped on one side and Russia on the other. One hears it remarked that these three Powers are neutral in the Turco-Italian war, but while the neutrality of England and France is benevolent towards Turkey, that of Russia is quite hostile. In liberal circles M Sassanof is being severely criticised—and what benefit, people ask, has he derived from the almost provoking attitude of Russia?

The correspondent of the Paris Temps telegraphs from Azizia that Emir Ali Pasha, the son of Amir Abdul Kader, has arrived there by way of Tobruk, Derna and Benghazi. He has been received with great honour by the Arabs. On the 1st of May a dirigible balloon dropped twelve bombs on the Turkish Camp at Azizia and though thousands of Arabs were present with more than a hundred camels, only one man was killed.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF 20th MAY 1912.)

A Council of Ministers was held yesterday, His Highness the Grand Vizier presiding. The following questions were considered.—

(1) The Naval Action of Italy—Talaat Bey, the Officiating Minister of the Interior, communicated to the Council the latest telegrams received in his office regarding the naval action of Italy. The Council decided to issue certain instructions to the authorities of the islands which have not yet been occupied by the Italians.

(2) The Situation in Albania—Talaat Bey showed to the Council that the telegrams received from the Valis of Kossovo and Scutari in Albania indicated a situation of no gravity at all. This is contrary to the assertions of certain foreign newspapers. The entire population of Albania, with the exception of a few misguided individuals, has manifested devotion to the Government.

(3) Despatches from our Foreign Ambassadors.—We are informed that according to the explanations given to our Ambassador, Turkhan Pasha, the movement of Russian troops into the Caucasus is due to purely internal causes and has nothing whatever to do with the political situation of Russia vis-a-vis Turkey.

(4) Current Affairs and the Commission of Reforms in Anatolia.—We understand that this Commission will leave for Anatolia in two or three weeks in order to undertake the work of introducing the required reform in those provinces.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF 21st MAY 1912.)

Hali Zia Bey, the first Secretary of the Palace, called on the Minister of War yesterday on behalf of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, to enquire after the health of Mahmoud Chevket Pasha.

The Grand Vizier informed the Ministers yesterday morning that a re-union would be held at the War Office. The deliberations commenced at 11 and following questions were discussed.—

(1) The Action of the Italian Fleet in the Aegean Sea. The Minister of Marine and officiating Minister of the Interior gave the latest information regarding the movements of the Italian fleet in the waters of the Archipelago. The telegrams indicate that the fleet is biding time for bombarding and occupying the remaining islands. The islands of Chio and Mytilene are constantly being visited. Italy has made the Archipelago the base of her future operations and has abandoned all action in the Tripolitaine. The Council considered the eventuality of the bombardment and occupation of the other islands, and certain other important measures of national defence were discussed.

(2) The expulsion of Italians.—After a long deliberation the Council decided to expel all Italians residing in the Ottoman Empire. An interval of 15 days will be allowed to them for their making necessary preparations for departure. This measure will not be applied to widows, religious orders and to workmen engaged on the construction of railway lines, etc.

The situation in Albania, the opening of Dardanelles and despatches from our Ambassador were the other things discussed.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF 22ND MAY 1912.)

The British Ambassador and M. Sarafoff, the Bulgarian Minister, called on Mahmoud Chevket Pasha yesterday to inquire after His Excellency's health.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC" OF 23RD MAY 1912.)

Under the heading "The Last Act" the well-known newspaper Budapesti Hirlap publishes a very remarkable article from which we reproduce a passage below—

"Whilst taking into consideration the situation of Turkey and Italy on one hand, and the attitude of the Great Powers on the other, one is forced to the conclusion that the war cannot last much longer.

By occupying the islands of the Aegean sea Italy has played her last cards. After this she possesses no means of exercising any pressure on Turkey, and the question is, will Italy be able with the assistance of her fleet to force the Sublime Porte to give up all existence? Contrary to the calculation of the Consulta, we can declare positively that the occupation of the islands will not change the attitude of Turkey in the least. It matters very little if Italy has hoisted her flag on a few islands. The Sultan, the Government, the Parliament and the Nation adhere to their resolve and will not part with their African possessions at any price. This is exactly what the Giolitti Government does not see or does not want to see. The cabinets of Europe, however, are aware of it that the Sultan and the Turks are determined rather to perish and give up the whole Empire than cede their African possessions, and that they are fighting not merely for retaining a territory inhabited by thousands of Sultan's subjects, but also for safeguarding the supreme interests of the Ottoman Empire and the prestige of the Sultan-Khalifa. Turkey would rather give up her provinces in the Balkan Peninsula where the Christians are in a majority, but Tripolitaine and Benghazi are Mussalman provinces and it would be a treason to Islam to cede these to a European Power. The Cabinets of Vienna, Berlin, Paris and London understand the point of view of Turkey and are not at all disposed to exercise any pressure upon her. As for their attitude towards Italy, the Powers are of opinion that if the Consulta still adheres to "annexation," she should make it an accomplished fact. But efforts have their limits. Italy has not only to look after her troops in Africa, but also after those that she has landed in the Archipelago. The maintenance of the fleet alone demands enormous sums of money every day. The Turks will not budge from the attitude they have taken up. Why undergo all this expense then and ruin the fleet? On the African battlefields the situation of the Italians is still more deplorable. The Turks and Arabs are natural allies against Italy—Allies made invincible by the guns that are already on the way, by the African heat, by dysentery and by cholera. If the Italian people can restrain the national and personal amour propre and replace it by a cool and sane judgment, they should conclude peace with Turkey on some other basis and endeavour to serve the interests of Italy by this peace. The first step however, towards the solution of the difficulty is the resignation of the present Cabinet."

The following telegram has been received from Vienna—

"Advices from London announce the submission of a memorial to the English Government by a union of Indian Mussulmans demanding that England should intervene actively in favour of Turkey in the Italo-Turkish war.

"This memorial makes some impression, because it is couched in energetic terms and demands that Turkish possessions should remain intact, the Turks being of the same blood as Indian Mussulmans."

The Paris journal learns from Rome that the little effect produced in Constantinople by the occupation of islands in the Aegean sea has caused great surprise and irritation in Italy, where it was believed that the extension of hostilities would reduce the Turks to beg for mercy.

The Expulsion of Italians.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT.)

Smyrna, May 20

THE Italian exodus began in real earnest on Monday last, when four steamers loaded with Italian exiles left Smyrna Harbour. There are several other boats advertised to sail, and it is believed that the Italian Government will send two large German liners to take those Italians left in the city on 24th May, the date of expiry of the expulsion order.

Though the German Consul and his Italian Committee give the poorer exiles passage money and 5 francs, the exodus is attended with heart-rending scenes. Hundreds of families who have sold off their goods hurriedly are extremely depressed at having to seek their fortunes in, as they believe, "climes unkind and new." They have been born and bred in Smyrna, and, never having travelled before, are fearful of the lot that awaits them in Greece and Italy. Many widows, whom the expulsion order allows to remain, break down on the quayside, and, refusing to be left behind, go, off hand-in-hand weeping with their homeless children. The entire Christian population is moved with pity for these unfortunate sufferers through a war they never wanted and have always condemned.

As the Turks were remarkably considerate until the Italians seized Rhodes, no blame, it is felt, can now be laid on them for expelling those who owe allegiance to their enemies. In fact, there are so many Cretan Moslem exiles in Smyrna, who clamour to have the Italians driven out of Smyrna, as they themselves, they say, were driven out of Crete, that many Europeans fear that the bad passions of these unruly Cretans may be roused at the sight of Italians and find vent in a general massacre of Christians. The Young Turks are by no means cheerful to see several thousand persons leaving the city, and they are well aware that the expulsion order looks like cutting off their nose to spite their face. Little business is being done except by furniture brokers and shipping agents. Most of the available cash in the city is in some way or other being used for the Italian exodus. It is generally believed that Italy will either attack or blockade Smyrna so soon as the Italian colony is expelled, and this fear paralyses all business.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT)

The expulsion of Italians at Smyrna has begun. Ship after ship has steamed across the Aegean to Naples, Brindisi, or Athens, crowded with miserable exiles, some denouncing the war and its authors, others dumb and stupefied. On the morning of the 19th, a French and an Austrian steamer, the vanguard of the hapless procession, dropped anchor off the Piræus. But according to accounts in the Italian press, not a single representative of the Italian Government went on board to meet its unhappy subjects. The Italian Embassy, the Consulate, gave no sign of life. To add to the misery of the expelled, half of them were unable to express themselves in Italian, for Italy had been so blind to its interests that for lack of Italian schools, education at Smyrna could only be obtained in French schools, and Italian citizens were now bemoaning in a foreign tongue that they were driven away from a fatherland whose speech was unknown to them.

Meanwhile unemployment is spreading in Italy. Hundreds of hungry labourers at Comacchio have broken out into serious disorders, and at a recent meeting of the Town Council of Milan a proposal to spend public money as a contribution to the national aeroplane fund, while 40,000 unemployed were in the city, was only carried amid the greatest confusion and persistent cries of "Down with the war!" In the columns of the Avanti Signor de Felice, the eloquent and popular Sicilian democratic leader and one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the African adventure, confesses, after eight months passed in Tripoli, that he has returned disillusioned and full of indignation at the methods by which the war was worked up. He roundly accuses various financial interests of having debauched public opinion, and promises to raise the question in Parliament.

(FROM REUTER'S CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, May 27

An order of expulsion affecting three thousand Italians has been finally issued. A fortnight's grace is allowed them.

Constantinople, May 28.

Preparations for the departure of Italians from Constantinople are being actively pursued, and the German Consulate-General is daily thronged with Italians applying for passports.

Owing to the doubts which have arisen regarding the categories of persons exempted from the decree of expulsion, the German Embassy has issued a detailed list of the classes which are not affected by the measure—namely (1) Foremen and labourers employed in the building of railways, (2) all workmen using their hand, such as masons, painters, carpenters, locksmiths, etc., and also all labourers paid daily, musicians are, however, excepted, even if they are in receipt of daily pay, (3) aged people; (4) single women dependent on themselves; (5) persons entrusted with the care of the sick or aged, (6) hospital doctors and surgeons, (7) widows; (8) monks and nuns.

The Italian employees of the Public Debt Administration have been granted leave, and are receiving travelling expenses and an indemnity.

Rome, Wednesday.

It is semi-officially announced to-day that the Government have decided to invite to Italy the Italian contract labourers, superintendents, foremen, and contractors living in Turkey whom the Porte has exempted from the decree of expulsion. They will be informed that steps are being taken to secure work for them in Italy.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, May 26.

The captain of the French steamer Caucase, who arrived at Naples this morning bringing 60 Italians who had been expelled from Smyrna, has lodged a complaint with the French Consul that his ship while flying the French flag was twice fired upon by the Turkish forts while clearing that port.

(FROM THE LONDON CORRESPONDENT OF THE "PIONEER.")

The Italo-Turkish war seems to have returned to one of its many periods of quiescence. The Porte's twenty-fourth threat to expel the Italians from the Ottoman dominions is being carried out. Numerous exceptions, however, are made and Italy is counteracting the Porte's blow by commanding those Italians who are permitted to remain to quit the country. The object of this move is not clear, because the embarrassment caused to Turkey will be infinitesimal compared with the suffering and loss inflicted upon individual Italians. But there is a great deal in connection with Italy's conduct of the war which puzzles the plain man. In an interesting article in the Daily Telegraph Dr. Dillon tells us that the clue to much that is mysterious in Italy's conduct is to be found in the exigencies of domestic politics. Signor Giolitti is not a foreign politician and he does not shine in geography. He once told the Bulgarian representative in Rome that Italy and Bulgaria were washed by the same sea. But he is a past master in all the artifices of political manipulation; and Dr. Dillon says that the war is being carried on, not so much for the glory of Italy or for the laurels of victory, as to keep the Premier in office. On reading Dr. Dillon's article one is reminded of what Mr. Trevelyan says in Garibaldi and the making of Italy. Mr. Trevelyan reluctantly admits that Cavour bequeathed to the statesmanship of new Italy the old traditions of duplicity, which have sometimes become low cunning in the hands of his successors with neither his virtues, his abilities, nor his dire necessities for their excuse.

The Situation in Albania.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonika, May 22

THOUGH definite action in Albania during the last few days has been limited to slight skirmishes between the troops and bands the situation has not failed to increase in gravity in the eyes of the Turkish authorities on the spot. The Albanians in Pristina and Vuchitrn are said to be greatly excited, and there are ominous rumours of preparations for a general revolt. For the second time the Ulemas have returned from an unsuccessful mission, and the local officials, having lost hope in the efficacy of argument and encouraged by the arrival of Constantinople troops at Ferizovitch, are anxious to ascertain the effects of gunpowder on the rebels.

The presence of the Reform Commission at Salonika, however, enables me to state that the bellicose ideas of the officials in Albania are not shared by the Minister of the Interior. Hadji Adil Bey is convinced that the present position is only an aggravation of the unsettled conditions prevailing during his tour, as illustrated by the three attacks on the Commission. He regards it as merely the chronic Albanian lawlessness in a slightly exaggerated form—possibly further increased by the instigation of disappointed ex-Deputies who failed to secure re-election owing to the opposition of the Committee. He is therefore averse from the employment of troops for any other purpose than to secure the building of roads, the construction of blockhouses, and other works to which the Government is committed. It is, doubtless, with the idea of driving home his point of view that the Minister departed suddenly incognito for Uskub this morning. It may, in any case, be assumed that there is no likelihood of a repetition of the thoughtless blunders which marked the campaigns of Djavid and Torgut Shevket Pashas. Alarmist news from Austrian sources should be discredited. Abdulla Pasha is in command of the troops now mobilizing at Ferizovitch.

I understand that Mufti Bey, ex-Deputy for Argyrokastrò, is endeavouring to excite the Southern Albanians. Little importance is attached to his efforts in official circles.

Constantinople, May 24.

The publication by the Tania and the Sabah of articles advocating the appointment of European officials to administrative posts in the European provinces of the Empire has given rise to circumstantial reports of the appointment of a European Inspector-General for Albanian and Macedonian villages which are both inaccurate and premature. It is true that a scheme has been proposed by certain members of the Government for the creation of a special department of the Ministry of the Interior, for the introduction of reforms as recommended by Hadji Adil Bey's Commission in the above-mentioned provinces, and the appointment of at least one European official to a highly responsible position in connection with the said department. There is no reason, however, to believe that the scheme has been adopted by the Cabinet as a whole, or that it could be adopted without risk of serious opposition from the strong Chauvinist elements of the Committee, whose mouthpieces the Hakk and the Judæo-Turkish Jamie Tur unsparingly condemn any such proposal.

Little definite news has been received from Albania to-day. The local Press announces the arrival of 25 wounded soldiers at Vuchitra, and the massing of Turkish troops at Ferizovitch, but information of the exact situation in the disturbed areas is wanting. The Salonika and Constantinople newspapers aver that four ex-Deputies, Ismail Kemal, Hassan Bey, of Pristina, Nedjib Draga, and Basri Bey, are among the insurgent leaders, but it is as yet uncertain whether the statements are not made with the object of diverting the Albanian Nationalists, who have always supported the Parliamentary Opposition against the Committee.

Salonica, May 24

In a memorandum presented to the Consuls of the Great Powers and to the Turkish authorities at Uskub, Ismail Kemal Bey, Deputy for Berat, states the Albanian demands as follows:

First, the delimitation of the boundaries of Albania; second, the recognition of an Albanian flag; third, the appointment of a Governor-General from among the members of the ancient reigning family of Albania; fourth, the substitution of Albanians for the Turkish-speaking officials; fifth, the adoption of Albanian as the official language; sixth, a guarantee of the above reforms by the Great Powers.

The memorandum adds that the Albanians will henceforth refuse to pay taxes and to furnish recruits for the Ottoman army.

The Turkish journal Ten. Asir publishes a striking impeachment of the Young Turkish policy in Albania under à nom de guerre which but thinly veils the personality of Hussein Kiazim Bey, Vali of Salonika. The writer sees the cause of the troubles which have beset the Ottoman Empire since the proclamation of the Constitution in the haste with which the Government has attempted to enforce the payment of taxes and the fulfilment of military service upon people who have been exempt from both claims from time immemorial. Further, in view of the fact that the Albanians have been accustomed for centuries to carry arms for private and national protection, the writer maintains that disarmament was a grave mistake. He goes on to prove that the consequence of the Government errors was discontent and disturbances among the Albanian tribes, who see in the Constitution only an enemy of their traditional customs. The Government must therefore recognize that its policy has been erroneous, renounce temporarily its pretensions, and endeavour to introduce a tranquil, harmonious life in Albania in order that with the progress of civilization, the natives may gradually become accustomed to law and taxation and accept the flag of Young Turkey. This programme the writer designates peaceful penetration.

May 23.

The Minister of the Interior has been so far successful in pouring oil on troubled waters that Hussein Kiazim Bey has withdrawn his resignation as Vali. The question is not yet finally adjusted since the Vali continues to make a point of the impeachment of the Cabinet of Hakk Pasha. It is doubtful whether a definite decision will be reached before the return of Hadji Adil to the capital. The Minister of the Interior will certainly carry back a lively appreciation of the necessity of maintaining Hussein Kiazim at Salonika.

One of the most courageous acts of this unique Turkish official has been to insist on the punishment of officials and the displacement of gendarmes officers concerned, in the series of public floggings which have accompanied the pursuit of Bulgarian komitadjis. In doing so he not only demonstrates his impartiality, but puts his finger on the chief cause of the increase of the bands. Though the Bulgarian Revolutionary Committee organizes the bands, they are nourished and kept alive by the floggings administered to peasants, often innocent, by the gendarmes. When the history of the Vali's action in this matter becomes generally known the effect produced will be more valuable than a decade of these so-called reforms to which we have become accustomed. It is a real attempt to strike at the heart of Macedonian unrest.

Constantinople, May 26.

An official communiqué to the Press denies the report that the ex-Deputy, Nedjib Draga, has joined the Albanian insurgents. According to letters from Salonika, dated 23rd May, the situation in Northern Albania is improving, no fresh skirmishes having occurred since the 18th instant. There is reason to believe that Hadji Adil Bey, who is expected at Constantinople on Wednesday, undertook his recent visit to Uskub merely in order to restrain the ardour of the military authorities and to oblige them to confine themselves as far as possible to protective measures and to "prompt legitimate suppression of any illegitimate movement that may take place," and to abstain from unnecessary and expensive punitive expeditions.

Constantinople, May 29.

The Minister of the Interior and the other members of the Reform Commission arrived in Constantinople this morning looking none the worse for the arduous and dangerous experiences of the last three and a half months. Hadji Adil Bey is now engaged in drawing up a series of recommendations as to reform administration in Albania and Macedonia, which will be laid before the Cabinet within a fortnight's time.

The Minister of Marine left to-day on board a destroyer to inspect the Dardanelles defences.

Iciuma, May 29.

The Turkish Government is stated to have granted, at the request of a commission of Albanian Beys and Notables, a short period of grace for further negotiation with the insurgent Albanians before resuming military operations against them. The chance of a peaceful settlement is, however, believed to be slight.

A telegram from Rome to the Zeit reports that Prince Vladro Castriota, who claims descent from Skanderbeg and aspires to the "Albanian throne," left Brindisi yesterday for the Albanian coast.

A deputation of Kosovo notables has been sent with a view to gaining over the Albanian rebels to peaceful counsels. Ismail Fadhil Pasha is taking over the command of the division concentrated at Ferizovitch.

Salonica, May 29

The situation in Albania remains unchanged, the action of the Government being limited to continuous pourparlers with the rebels through the mission comprised of Ulema and Beys. The negotiations are proving only partially successful, since a number of Batraktars are apparently determined to pursue an attitude of hostility towards the authorities. The present position, therefore, is that the Albanians are massed in the mountains round Trutiza and the expeditionary corps is at Ferizovitch, neither side apparently wishing to commence hostilities. How long these conditions can continue remains to be seen. On their part the Albanians cannot remain inactive in the mountains indefinitely, and the local Turkish officials are again pressing for a military demonstration. The Minister of the Interior persists in his opposition to this idea, and it is a favourable sign that the departure of Abdulla Pasha, who has been designated to command the forces at Ferizovitch, has been delayed.

The Government, however, is rapidly strengthening the army in Albania. A machine-gun company stationed at Strumitza has been ordered north to Uchack, Reservist have already left Smyrna, and the Reservist divisions at Ishub and Elbassan are being mobilized for service in Kosovo.

The only serious incident of the last few days occurred in the district of Vaspas, where a body of rebels attacked a gendarmerie station. The gendarmes defended the position for four hours until reinforcements arrived, when, deserting the blockhouse, they retired to Lyuma. The Kaimakam fears a general outbreak and demands the urgent despatch of reinforcement.

The Rumoured Conference.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A WELL-KNOWN Berlin paper publishes the following outspoken utterance by Asim Bey, the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, in the course of a conversation with its Constantinople representative.—"It is obvious that since the change in the Russian Embassy Russia has been trying to arrange an international conference. Such a gathering, however, is unnecessary. Turkey can settle the quarrel with Italy by her own efforts, and a conference would mean the virtual extinction of the Ottoman Empire. We have no domestic disturbances, and so long as we can rely on our brave army we shall be in a position to suppress in its beginning every conflict engineered by foreign agitators. The foreign Powers know this as well as we do. But is not Nicholas (of Montenegro), father-in-law of the King of Italy? and, besides, he recently visited Russia. As for the aspirations of Bulgaria, I know them only too well, having been at one time Minister at Sofia. We do not want and need no international conference—we do not want any dismemberment."

The idea of a European conference to settle the Italo-Turkish war seems to have been buried before it even attained the age of walking. The last handful of earth is thrown on its grave by the National Zeitung, which speaks semi-officially thus.—"The idea of a conference was accepted with eagerness in those quarters where people expected to gain something by it—in Paris, London, and St. Petersburg. It would scarcely be betraying a secret to say that Vienna and Berlin did not share this enthusiasm. Their disinterested policy certainly justifies this attitude, which, of course, is not opposed to a pacific mediation. Russia may count on the benevolence of Berlin and Vienna in case the question of the Dardanelles should be brought up for discussion, but for the regulation of these Mediterranean questions such a considerable political engine as a conference is not wanted, and may, indeed, only serve as a screen to conceal selfish interests. The experience which Germany gained at Algéciras is not calculated to dispose her favourably towards the idea of an international conference."

As the Vossische Zeitung is informed from Vienna, the idea of a conference has now indeed been officially given up, and the Chancelleries are now preoccupied with a novel idea—namely, that of an armistice.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Vienna, May 24

In a semi-official article the Neues Wiener Tagblatt observes that those who launch the idea of an international conference as a means of settling the Turco-Italian conflict seem to have no notion of the distance that separates the idea from the possibility of its realization, which depends in the first place upon a complete agreement between the Powers as to the expediency of a conference, and in the second place upon the exact formulation of a strictly limited programme. Otherwise a conference could only cause confusion and render the situation worse, not better.

Vienna, May 26

No European conference, no prospect of peace, no Russo-Italian Entente, no likelihood of Balkan disturbances, no lack of harmony between Austria-Hungary and Germany, are the slightly negative tidings that reach Vienna as the upshot of Count Berchtold's visit to Berlin. The war it appears, was the chief subject of conversation, but, however interesting the exchange of Austro-Hungarian and German views may have been, the world will not be much the wiser for the echo that has been allowed to reach it.

Interest here turns rather towards the Mediterranean and the discussion of an Anglo-French alliance than towards the Berlin conversations. Minor Press organs of the kind which Teutonic diplomacy delights to use for the irresponsible dissemination of salutory ideas represent, indeed, the Anglo-French understanding as tottering to its fall at the approach of Baron Von Marschall, and the Anglo-Russian understanding as in the last stage of decrepitude, but in serious quarters the possible effects of the war upon the strategic arrangements of France and England and the counter-effects of their decisions upon the position of Italy appear to be under consideration. It is perceived quite as clearly in Vienna as in London or Paris that the occupation of the Aegean Islands by Italy is likely to complicate the international situation both before and after the conclusion of peace, and the equanimity with which the Italian operations were originally regarded on the assumption that they would be particularly unwelcome to England seems now to be mitigated by reflection that the measures which England and France may conceivably be moved to adopt might guarantee Mediterranean equilibrium in a manner not entirely foreseen. It may safely be assumed that, though not mentioned in the reports from Berlin, Mediterranean issues and their bearing on the renewal of the Triple Alliance, with or without a "Mediterranean clause," will have figured prominently in the Berlin conversations, but it would probably be erroneous to conclude that the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister will have committed himself to any hard and fast policy in regard to the immediate or more remote future. As far as can be judged from external indications, the present policy of Austria-Hungary is one of observant expectancy inspired by a determination not to suffer Austro-Hungarian interests to be compromised, and, within that limit, by a wish to act as an element of international stability.

Much attention has been attracted here by the protest of the Veli of Salonica, Hussein Kiazim Bey, in a local Turkish journal, against the adoption of a violently repressive policy in dealing with the Albanians. It is considered a notable and encouraging sign that so influential and competent an official as Hussein Kiazim should have the courage publicly to denounce the fatal policy hitherto adopted by the various Committee Cabinets.

Vienna, May 26

The Marquis Pallavicini, the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador at Constantinople, scarcely seems to share the optimism that is alleged to have characterized Count Berchtold's intercourse with the German Government. "I consider the situation arising from the occupation of Aegean islands by the Italians to be graver than it was when the war was confined to Africa," the Ambassador is reported to have said to a representative of the Neue Freie Presse to-day. "In any case, there now exists the possibility that the Italians may operate against points nearer the Dardanelles than the Island of Rhodes, and it would naturally not be desirable that the question of closing the Straits should again arise. As long as the war lasts, the situation must continue to inspire concern from the standpoint of general European interests." The Marquis Pallavicini added that though no means of promoting peace had yet been found, hope must not be abandoned. In expelling the Italians, Turkey had taken a very deplorable step, though it is to be expected that the decrees of expulsion will not be carried out in all its rigour.

The Neue Freie Presse, for its part, deals with the question of the Dardanelles and the Mediterranean in the light of the trip undertaken by Mr. Asquith and Mr. Churchill, and of the discussion by various French and English journals of the expediency of converting the Anglo-French Entente into a formal defensive alliance. The idea of such a conversion appears to perturb the Prusse-Viennese organ and to inspire it with solicitude for the position of Russia. "Russia," it writes, "desires the opening of the Dardanelles for her warships. Hence the idea may have arisen in England of obtaining by an alliance with France—who is to build 28 Dreadnoughts—an auxiliary fleet that, without costing a penny, will relieve the English Fleet of the burden of ruling the Mediterranean. But an Anglo-French alliance is a problem not easily to be solved. Will Russia agree to let herself be pushed into the second rank, and more or less to make over her position in Paris to the English? Will the English people bring itself to prove of a policy of hereditary enmity towards Germany, and to support with English blood another conquest of Alsace by the French? Will the French Government be disposed to let itself be drawn into the abyss of Anglo-German rivalry?"

The Neue Freie Presse rightly thinks that "the future of peace" may depend upon the answer given to these questions, but it omits, some by strange lack of perspicacity, to point out that neither England nor France is likely to be less considerate of Russian susceptibilities and interests in the Mediterranean and elsewhere than the improvised friends of Russia who control its utterances.

Vienna, May 29.

A semi-official note observes this evening that the idea of a European conference as a means of settling the Turco-Italian conflict has extraordinarily little prospect of being realized. There is a general agreement, it adds, that an indispensable condition of the convocation of a conference would be the strict limitation of the programme to the Tripolitan issue. But if either belligerent were prepared to moderate its uncompromising standpoint in regard to Tripoli, peace could be promoted by simple mediation, whereas if Turkey insists on the maintenance of Ottoman suzerainty and Italy on upholding her decree of annexation, a conference would be not only futile but dangerous, inasmuch as its inevitable failure would aggravate the situation.

There is reason to believe this note to reflect the Austro-Hungarian official view, which after Count Berchtold's Berlin visit must be taken to correspond to the German view. Inasmuch, as both belligerents are understood to oppose the idea of a conference, it may therefore be regarded as devoid of present importance.

Some surprise is felt by serious diplomats here that the conference idea should ever have been seriously mooted. There is no precedent for the meeting of a conference before the conclusion of at least an armistice, and the case of the Congress of Berlin shows that before the Powers approach the Eastern question in solemn conclave some of them are likely to require a guarantee that they will not go away empty-handed. Austria-Hungary attended the Berlin Congress in the certainty that the price of her neutrality in the Russo-Turkish War would be paid by European assent to her occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and other Powers may well have had a notion that Cyprus and Tunis would eventually come under their control. In view of the Italian occupation of the Aegean islands the programme of a new conference could not be restricted to the question of Tripoli alone. And, however sincere may be the attachment of the Powers to the status quo in Turkey, and, however profound their faith in the vitality of the Ottoman Empire, it may be doubted whether all of them would be prepared to tie their hands in regard to the future by subscribing formally to a self-denying ordinance of unlimited duration.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The other day M. Jean Herbette, writing in the Sécler, drew attention to the possibility of Italy retaining the possession of the islands she is now seizing in the Aegean, and thus changing the balance of power in the Eastern Mediterranean. In his view, however, no great harm is likely to accrue from it to any Power except Russia, whose exit from the Dardanelles—should the straits be one day opened to her warships—would thus be blocked by a chain of Italian naval forts and stations. In these circumstances M. Herbette ventured to express surprise at the Russian policy of diplomatic co-operation with Italy—in fact, his main object was to criticise that policy now that Russia seems to be fretting at the lukewarm attitude of the French Government towards her efforts in the Balkans and at Constantinople.

The Temps enlarges upon the dangers of the Italian occupation of the Aegean Islands with a much wider sweep than M. Herbette. It prints a long article from one of its London correspondents on the forthcoming meeting of Mr. Asquith, Mr. Churchill, and Lord Kitchener at Malta, in the course of which the writer, after describing how even the position of Tripoli will affect the Mediterranean position of France, says: "The situation is indeed changing rapidly. Italy occupies today a much more formidable but at the same time more vulnerable position than at the beginning of the war. What she could do in the past with her respectable forces on the frontier of South Tyrol and in Venetia, and with her navy concentrated at Spezzia or Maddalena, she will no longer be able to do with 100,000 men fixed, no doubt for several years, in Tripoli, and with garrisons stationed in the Archipelago. It will therefore no longer be possible for her to manoeuvre dexterously between the Triple Alliance and the Western Powers—she will have to choose." And the writer is of the opinion that it will not be towards the latter group that she will turn, since "she will no doubt consider that of all possible dangers that of seeing the Austrian masses descending into Venetia is the gravest."

The correspondent of the Temps comes to the conclusion that one of the possible consequences of the present war will be the strengthening of the position of the Triple Alliance in the Mediterranean, and that "there are more chances than ever of seeing the Austrian and Italian navies, originally built against one another, sailing henceforth side by side in the Mediterranean."

The well-known writer of the Bulletin d'Etranger in the same journal completely shares, or pretends to share, this view. "The occupation of the Turkish islands in the Aegean is completely changing the balance of power in one of the world's sea routes. Italian public opinion is visibly hardening to the view that what is good to take is also good to keep, and that the occupation of the islands, while an inadequate weapon to compel Turkey to accept peace, is a much better means than the conquest of Tripoli for the development of those vital interests of Italy in the Mediterranean which Bismarck so resolutely ignored at the time of the conclusion of the Triple Alliance." The writer of the Bulletin foresees the possibility of the Eastern Mediterranean thus turning into a "fief of the Triple Alliance," to the great detriment of the Triple Entente and above all of Russia, and invites the "interested Powers, loyal friends of Italy, but also mindful of their own interests," to examine the new situation.

Writing on the visit of Count Berchtold, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, to Berlin, the Vienna correspondent of the Temps quotes the Deutsches Volksblatt, an organ connected with the Court of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, the heir to the Austrian Crown, as declaring that there is absolute unanimity between Count Berchtold and German Government quarters, "in consequence of which the two Governments will act in common in all that concerns the Russian idea of a European Conference. "Germany and Austria-Hungary," explains the Vienna journal, "will not refuse to take part in a conference, but they will avoid all steps calculated to create fresh difficulties for the Turkish Government. They are anxious that an understanding should come about between Rome and Constantinople, but they will not lend their hands to such acts as may wound the national pride of one or the other of the parties or threaten the integrity of Turkey."

These are very important words, but in addition they have a special application as explained by the Vienna correspondent of the Temps. "A rumour," he says, "has been current in diplomatic quarters that Italy, without desiring to retain the islands in the Archipelago, has nevertheless the intention of creating there a sort of autonomy which would afterwards permit her to gain influence among the population and to profit by the sympathies thus provoked for the establishment of a naval base. This idea, it is stated, has not at all been to the taste of the Vienna Cabinet, but it was uncertain hitherto whether this mode of viewing the situation was also shared by Germany."

The same view of complete solidarity between the Berlin and Vienna Cabinets is propounded by Count Hoyos, Count Berchtold's secretary in an interview with a representative of the Vossische Zeitung. Perfect unanimity, he declares, exists between the two countries on all points of their policy. That policy "is directed towards the maintenance of peace in the Balkans under all circumstances and the prevention of all complications that may arise out of the Italo-Turkish war." Count Hoyos derided as "perfect non sense" the rumour that Germany, Austria, and Russia had agreed upon the dismemberment of European Turkey. He emphatically denied the possibility of any renewal in the near future of the attempt to mediate in the present war, and spoke optimistically of the outlook in Albania and the attitude of the King of Montenegro.

The Sultan in Captivity.

There is a certain Turk in Salonika for whom the upraised Italian war-sword has no terrors. This is one Abdul Hamid, dethroned Sultan, who, in happy ignorance of the dangers which beset his country, is spending the last days of his life in captivity jealously guarded by that same army which overthrew him. The ex-Commander of the Faithful has for prison a handsome villa on the east side of the city and on the shores of the winding bay of Salonika. Abdul has for neighbours wealthy foreigners, chiefly Greeks. Having amassed riches in the ancient Macedonian capital, they have built themselves stately homes on the shores of its beautiful bay.

The Villa Latini, which the "Red Sultan" now inhabits, was bought by the Turkish Government from one of these princes of local commerce. It has spacious grounds, and is shut in by a high wall. The building is a three-storied one, and the upper floors and the terra-cotta roof are visible from the highway which skirts the northern boundary wall. On this side a broad valley dips away from the roadway. Here is rich meadow land, the intense green of which stands out in vivid contrast to the dull brown of the bare hills which form a background to the picture.

The present distinguished tenant of the Villa Latini can have no reason to complain of monotony of scenery. Southwest across the bay, and beyond the flat, low-lying land which forms one of the horns of the crescent-shaped bay, is the frontier of Greece and Turkey. Here, sentinel like, on the threshold of Greek Thessaly and Turkish Macedonia, mighty Olympus, the abode of the immortal gods, rears her snowcapped head. To-day its once sacred groves afford shelter to prowling Greek and Turkish banditti, who set equally at defiance the anger of Zeus and the decrees of man. When the south-east wind blows, and white horses racing up the gulf of Salonika din themselves into the bay, then divine Olympus hides her face behind a veil of cloud. But more often is she in a genial mood. Then she shows herself to her devoted worshippers in the fulness of her unrivalled splendour.

A double line of sentries, who, in fine weather or foul weather, shelter in conical-topped white painted boxes, effectively cut off Abdul Hamid from any communication with the outside world. These quaint-looking sentry boxes are fitted with peephole windows, and from whatever point of the compass you attempt to approach the ex-Sultan's prison you may be sure that at least one pair of sharp questioning eyes are intently following your every movement. A guardhouse flanks the main road on the north of the villa, and there is a second and larger one, with accommodation for a half company of infantry, at the south-eastern corner of the high garden wall.

Cicero during one period of his exile lived in Salonika, and now, by some cruel irony of fate, local tradition describes his residence as having stood near to, if not actually on, the site of that of the fallen Turkish tyrant. There was recently some talk of a reactionary plot for the liberation of the imprisoned ex-Sultan, but it is difficult to see how his adherents hoped to smuggle him out of the villa grounds and through the double cordon of soldiery. The illustrious prisoner himself is little inclined to venture afresh on to that political stage where he played so eventful and sinister a rôle.

The Abdul Hamid of to-day is a lonely and unhappy man, with a troubled conscience and the haunting memories of an evil past to keep him company. He is often morose and petulant. The man who sent so many of his subjects to a violent and unmerited death now lives himself in constant dread of being done to death in secret. For this wretched captive the spectre of the assassin lurks everywhere, it is ever by his side. He fears death from the hands of those who are brought into daily contact with him, and whose duty it is to minister to his wants. At other times his feverish brain imagines that in the world beyond the walls of his prison revengeful men are plotting his end. They will assuredly, he fears, break into the prison some night or other and put him to death.

His passionate attachment to life is such as to overcome even his avarice. As a condition for the handing over to the Turkish National Exchequer of some of his hoarded wealth he, shortly after his captivity began, asked that his prison walls should be raised an additional 8 feet and that the main entrance, which was on the north side of the villa, should be bricked up. The Government acceded to his request, and the chief entrance to the house is now through a narrow gateway on the west side. He also stipulated for the placing of stout steel bolts on the inside of the doors of his suite of rooms. The keys of the doors of his rooms he is accustomed to carry with him always.

The other day, armed with a special permission from a high quarter, I went to the villa with authority to see the ex-Sultan should he be willing to receive me. The Imperial prisoner happened to be in one of his perverse moods. After cross-examining the officer who had announced me, he, as if suspecting some attempt on his life or some fresh raid on his purse, went and shut himself up in his room, declining to see any visitor.

One of his medical attendants, who was kind enough to furnish me with many particulars concerning the daily life of Abdul Hamid, assured me that on the whole he enjoys good physical health. It was quite untrue, he said, that the ex-Sultan had fallen a victim to the opium habit. He smoked heavily, not opium, but Turkish cigarettes.

Abdul has his gloomy moods and his periodic fits of intense mental depression. For over three months he has not once quitted his apartments to go down into the garden. His sedentary habits and his rooted aversion to physical exercise in any form are increasing his obesity and also his irritability. He is much stouter now than when he quitted Yildiz Kiosk.

The fallen autocrat is treated with the greatest deference by those who are charged with his safe keeping. He is subjected to no harsh or degrading régime. At the Villa Latini he lives in semi-regal state, and, to a very large extent, his will as expressed there is law. The Young Turks, whatever be their faults, have never forgotten that although Abdul Hamid was a merciless enough tyrant, he once ruled over the Osmanli people.

The military commandant at the Villa sees his prisoner, but at rare intervals, and then only when either summoned by the ex-Sultan himself or charged with the conveyance of some instructions by the Government or the local military authorities. Formerly, during the day armed sentries patrolled within the grounds of the villa, but these have now been removed lest their presence should prove irksome to the Royal captive, were he to venture forth into the garden in quest of sunshine and fresh air.

Abdul has two regular medical attendants—military doctors attached to the Salonika garrison. One or other of these goes to the Villa thrice weekly, and, sending in his card, inquires if the ex-Sultan has need of his services. It occasionally happens that the deposed ruler, suffering from some slight indisposition, sends for the doctor, and that on the latter's arrival, Abdul, being in one of his petulant moods, refuses to see him. Not very long ago he urgently summoned his medical attendant late at night, and then kept him waiting two hours before he would consent to receive him.

The post of physician to the Imperial inmate of the Villa Latini is one that calls for the exercise of great tact, forbearance, and patience. The physician must also have faith in the prophylactic qualities of his own physic, for he is often called upon to take a preliminary dose of it in the presence of his patient.

Now and again the routine is varied, and Abdul selects one of the domestics—for preference, the principal valet—on whom he bestows the thankless post of medicine-taster-in-chief. One day, not long since, the doctor in attendance prescribed for the ex-Sultan a mixture of which quinine formed part. A trial dose was duly administered to the valet. He was new to the duty, the stuff was bitter, and in swallowing it the medicine-taster made a wry face.

That grimace was enough. Abdul, with a craftiness worthy of other days, seized the bottle and poured away the contents. Frequently that day he sent to inquire if the medicine-taster was still alive. Greatly to his astonishment, the valet, hearty and well and feeling none the worse for his experience, was presented for his inspection on the following morning.

He is equally exacting regarding his food. The ordeal of tasting is exclusively reserved for the chief cook. The dethroned Padishah has a marked fondness for certain Turkish dishes prepared with rice and finely chopped meat. When a dish is brought to the ex-Sultan's table, the chief cook accompanies it, and stands at attention, like a soldier awaiting orders. Abdul, armed with a large spoon, will hover indecisively over the dish for a second or two. Then, having selected his point of attack, he will plunge the spoon into the heart of the steaming hot mass, and, withdrawing it filled, hand the spoon to the cook. If that functionary should evince any hesitation in sampling the food, the dish is at once rejected by the suspicious Abdul.

The living apartments are on the first floor, and the ex-Ruler of Turkey passes his time between his bedroom and a suite of two rooms which adjoin it. One is a study, in which are several hundred volumes, chiefly Turkish. A second serves as a combined sitting and smoking room. Here it is that the ex-Sultan passes entire days. He sits curled up on a divan smoking or else seeking mental solace from the perusal of the work of some Turkish writer. He is not allowed access to current literature, Turkish or foreign, whether in the shape of books, magazines, or newspapers, hence he is a complete stranger to contemporary events, national as well as international. Indeed, never once since his incarceration has he expressed any wish to learn what men and nations were doing and how fared that busy world from which he has now been shut off for three years.

About six months ago he devoted several hours daily to writing, presumably the preparing of his memoirs. But, repenting of his industry, he one day tore up his manuscript, and that has been the end of his literary efforts. Abdul Hamid in captivity pays but little attention to his personal appearance. When not attired in an old dressing gown he favours a much-worn frock-coat, slippers, and the orthodox fez or tarboosh. Collar and tie he never wears nowadays.

Eighteen months ago, at his own request, he was supplied with a small tool chest—it was of the kind one would present to a boy of 14. With this rude equipment he has built two miniature mosques, a third is uncompleted. He has also contrived to carve roughly 10 or 12 toy soldiers. The ex-Sultan, however, lacks the power of concentration and is unable to devote himself for any length of time to any task, hobby, or distraction.

At night he omits no precaution that could possibly ensure his personal safety. On retiring to bed he locks his bedroom door so that none can enter while he is asleep. Sometimes he will insist on his bed being removed from corner to corner of the sleeping apartment. Occasionally he will sleep on the divan in the sitting room so that it is difficult for his attendants to say beforehand with any degree of certainty where the terror-haunted man will attempt to seek repose. Once after his valet had placed his bed in an indicated part of the sleeping apartment, the prisoner himself, after the valet's departure, removed it unaided to another corner of the room.

All the servants at the villa are Turks enjoying the full confidence of the party in power. They are accustomed to the eccentricities of the old man, and gratify his whims as far as possible. So, a prey to never-ceasing apprehension, the once mighty Caliph thus passes the few remaining years of his existence. Will the thunder of Italian cannon greet his ears some morning, emphasising the peril which menaces not so much himself as Turkey and her people? One wonders!—Daily Chronicle.

The Emancipation of Turkish Women.

The author of an article, entitled "The Girl Graduate in Turkey," which appeared recently in the Lady, gives a glowing account of the work done by the American College for Girls at Constantinople, and takes a quite hopeful view of the future for the women of Turkey.

It must be said, to the credit of the new régime, that, in addition to permitting philanthropic foreigners, without hampering and harassing them, to carry the light of emancipation to the Turkish fair sex, it is trying to evolve an educational system which will provide adequate facilities for the girls to acquire knowledge. During the last few years many schools especially and exclusively designed for girls have been established, and many more are being built. An effort is being made to train teachers to staff these new academies and text-books are being compiled along modern lines.

The work of emancipation proceeds slowly. In some towns any man seen talking with a Moslem woman in public renders himself liable to a fine, while the woman must submit to be bastinadoed!

However such stringent measures are more than offset by the fact that the conscience of Islam is slowly being quickened, and that it has commenced to feel the sting of shame at the low state of Moslem women. The men followers of the Prophet are beginning to believe and declare that their women are not being treated as well as Muhammad intended them to be. They are searching the Koran for proof of this assertion, and are showing by the great Teacher's own words that he expected woman to have a much higher status than is given in Islam to-day. They quote texts to prove that Muhammad really prohibited plurality of wives, and they expatiate on the fact that their religion gave to women at its promulgation property and divorce rights that they have enjoyed through the centuries.

Turkey, more than any other Moslem country, shows the action of this Islamic revival. The Sheikh-ul-Islam, whose position corresponds with that of the Primate here, has unhesitatingly spoken in favour of feminine progress. The present Sultan, too, is sympathetic towards the movement.—The Near East.

Aviation in Turkey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST."

SIR, The successful flight of a British pilot on the Sultan's Accession Day, when a Repp monoplane soared 1,400 metres above the highest point of Pera, must be regarded as the commencement of a new era in Ottoman annals. For under the Hamidian régime, which is not so long ago, the idea of anyone defying the laws of terrestrial gravitation was religiously tabooed and it is on record that an Armenian who suggested making an ascent in a balloon was watched by the spies of Yildiz for weeks, and was obliged by superior order to renounce his intention. So, if we except the ludicrous feat of a Frenchman who, in the time of Abdul Aziz, fell from a tree-top in an endeavour to fly a hawk-like machine, one may safely say that since the days of Daedalus of Crete, the world's first airman, the noble art of aviation was till quite recently unknown in Turkey, and Blériot's disaster on the Champ de Mars here three years ago was not calculated to inspire the stolid Turk with much confidence in the practical possibilities of the invention.

The present war, however, in which the strategical advantages of the aeroplane on the Italian side have been demonstrated, has had the effect of waking the Turkish official world to the needs of the day and public and private interest in the art has been aroused. The War Office, which is the most progressive of all the State Departments, has created a special aviation section, under the superintendence of Lieutenant-Colonel Sureya Bey, son of an ex-Minister of War, in order to promote the science in the army.

I am not at liberty to give the names of the firms whose tenders have been accepted by the Government, but it is satisfactory to note that already five machines have been ordered, including that which flew last Saturday.

Technically speaking, the Constantinople field, starting from the San Stefano base, is unsatisfactory, owing to the variable atmospheric conditions, but with the gradual extension of the experiments better sites will be chosen. A trial of the hydroplane would also be of interest on the land-locked waters of the Marmora, which are generally calm.

L. MORRIS.

Constantinople, 3rd May 1912

Ottoman Finance.

WE TAKE the following extract from the review of M. A. Heidborn's book, "Droit Public et Administratif De l'Empire Ottoman," which recently appeared in the Times Literary Supplement :—

To one who has had experience of the Ministry of Finance for over thirty years the very aspect of this Department shows the change that has come over the scene. Thirty years ago the Ministry of Finance was a crowded, noisy, and dilapidated building where soldiers, pensioners, civil functionaries, contractors, foreign claimants, Embassy and Consular dragomans, women with their children, itinerant lemonade sellers, biscuit sellers, water carriers, beggar's dogs, and pigeons were all mixed up in inextricable confusion. The public struggled, shouted, hustled and fought their way through the corridors. In the Departments fifties or hundreds of unpaid clerks sat round in frowsy arm-chairs, smoking, drowsing and talking, waiting for the moment when they could with decency slink away to catch their Bosphorus steamer, and only deigning to put pen to paper when the interested party was prepared to pay. The writer has seen hundreds, nay, thousands, of women thronging the steps and corridors of the building shrieking at the top of their voices and holding out long poles with muslin bags at the end to some "guichet" or doorway in the hope of receiving the tenth part of payments due for the last ten or fifteen years. The writer has seen these same women abusing and honneting foreign creditors, perhaps more fortunate in their request for payment than the poor Turkish applicants, and has seen them besiege the Minister in his room, beat him and break his carriage windows, in spite of several battalions of rough Turkish soldiers, who could not be induced to take strong measures against the weaker sex. When Lord Goschen was Ambassador to Constantinople he was once the interested spectator of a scene of this kind. It must have been an entirely new experience for a Chancellor of the Exchequer fresh from Downing Street. Not a sign of all this is left. The Ministry of Finance to-day is as quiet and dignified a Department as could be found in Europe. Everything runs smoothly and regularly. All the Departments have been reorganized, the regularly paid clerks all know their duty, and the Minister is no longer only a mere paymaster appearing on pay day, but a serious and overworked official, just as capable and efficient as the Minister of any other country in Europe.

As to the framing of the Budget and the financial policy of the country, a recent report of the British Delegate on the Ottoman Debt Council may be quoted :—

Since the advent to power of the constitutional Government it is possible to know exactly how the receipts are applied. There is no attempt at concealment. In former years the Minister of Finance were cyphers. They had absolutely no control, and were mere paymasters. Whenever they had any available cash it was immediately "commandeered", and with or without their knowledge and consent, applied to the most pressing creditors. Sometimes it was the officials or the troops who got a month's pay, sometimes it was a persistent contractor who had to be satisfied, sometimes a foreign Embassy on behalf of a foreign creditor, and often the Palace itself which demanded immediate payment. The whole financial situation was wrapped in the greatest obscurity, not to say secrecy, and practically none knew how the money was expended, and none cared as long as discontent could be bought off, and funds were forthcoming for the Court and its favourites.

In two years the financial administration has been practically reorganized from top to bottom. Budgets, which represent real and not imaginary and fictitious figures, are drafted with absolute sincerity, which, as Monsieur Laurent has said, might set an example to States long accustomed to financial regularity. These are openly discussed and approved by the Chamber of Deputies, and there is no longer secrecy or obscurity. The expenditure is checked and audited in accordance with a law voted by the Chamber.

All this as since the Constitution; and, whatever faults may be attributed to the Young Turks, credit must be given to them for their attempt, in spite of overwhelming difficulties, to put things straight as regards their financial administration.

The Closing of the Dardanelles.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Now that the pressure upon your space due to the clash of opposing views of domestic politics is likely to be for the moment relaxed, you may, perhaps, not think it inappropriate that attention should be recalled to a question of permanent international interest raised by the recent action of the Turkish Government in closing the Dardanelles to even commercial traffic.

I cordially agree, as would, I suppose, most people, with your leading article of some weeks since in deprecating any crude application to the case of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus of dicta with reference to freedom of passage through straits connecting two open seas. It would, indeed, be straining what may be taken to be a general principle of international law to say that Turkey is by it prohibited from protecting her threatened capital by temporarily closing the Straits.

A good deal of vague reference has, however, been made in the discussions which have taken place upon the subject to "Treaties" under which it seems to be thought that trading ships enjoy, under all circumstances, rights of free navigation through the Straits in question which they would not have possessed otherwise. I should like, therefore, with your permission, to state what seem to be the relevant Treaty provisions upon the subject, whether between the Powers constituting the European Concert collectively, or between Russia and Turkey as individual Powers.

As to what may be described as the "European" Treaties, it is necessary, once for all, to put aside as irrelevant Article 10 of the Treaty of Paris of 1856 and its annexed Convention, Article 2 of the Treaty of London of 1871, and the confirmatory Article 63 of the Treaty of Berlin of 1878. These articles have exclusive reference to the "ancient rule of the Ottoman Empire," under which, so long as the Porte is at peace, no foreign ships of war are to be admitted into the Straits. There are, however, two articles, still in force, of these "European" treaties which may seem to bear upon the present inquiry. By Article 12 of the Treaty of Paris—

Free from any impediment, the commerce in the ports and waters of the Black Sea shall be subject only to regulations of health, Customs, and police, framed in a spirit favourable to the development of commercial transactions.

And by Article 3 of the Treaty of London—

The Black Sea remains open, as heretofore, to the mercantile marine of all nations.

It is submitted that these provisions relate solely to commerce carried on by vessels already within the Black Sea, and contain no covenant for an unrestricted right of access to that sea.

As between Russia and Turkey individually, Treaties which are still in force purport, no doubt, to give to the former a stronger claim to free passage through the Straits for her mercantile marine than that which can be supposed to be enjoyed by other Powers. By Article 7, for instance, of the Treaty of Adrianople of 1829, the Porte recognizes and declares the passage of the "Canal de Constantinople," and of the Strait of Dardanelles, to be entirely free and open to Russian merchant vessels, and goes on to extend the same privilege to the merchant vessels of all Powers at peace with Turkey. Article 24 of the Treaty of San Stefano is still more explicit, providing that "the Bosphorus and Dardanelles shall remain open in time of war as in time of peace to the merchant vessels of neutral States arriving from or bound to Russian ports." The rest of the article contains a promise by the Porte never henceforth to establish a "fictitious blockade, at variance with the spirit of the Declaration of Paris," meaning thereby such a blockade of ports on the Black Sea as had been enforced by Turkish ships of war stationed at the entrance to the Bosphorus.

It may well be doubted whether these articles containing concessions extorted from Turkey at the end of wars in which she had been defeated, ought not, like so many other provisions of the Treaty of San Stefano, to have been abrogated by the Treaty of Berlin. They are of such a character that, in the struggle for existence, Turkey can hardly be blamed for disregarding them. As was said long ago, Ius commerciorum æquum est, at hoc acquies, tuendae salutis. The imperious necessities of self-preservation were recognized both by Lord Morley and by Lord Lansdowne in the debate which took place on 3rd May, although Lord Lansdowne intimated that the real question, which will have to be considered sooner or later, is the extent to which a belligerent Power, controlling narrow waters which form a great trade avenue for the commerce of the world, is justified in entirely closing such an avenue in order to facilitate the hostile operations in which the Power finds itself involved. It is, I think, clear that the solution of a question at once so novel and so delicate must be undertaken, not by any one Power, but by the Concert of Europe, or of the civilized world, which must devise some guarantee for the safety of any littoral Power which would be called upon in the general interest to restrict its measures of self-defence. In the meantime, we may surely say that the case is provided for neither by established international law nor by "European" Treaties; and, further, that the Treaties between Russia and Turkey, which do provide for it, are not such as it is desirable to perpetuate.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

PROFESSOR T. E. HOLLAND.

OXFORD, 22nd May.

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says:—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him.....Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

Apply to the Manager, THE "COMRADE,"
109, Rpon Street, CALCUTTA.

Al-Hilal.

A new Illustrated Weekly Journal in Urdu.

It has important literary, religious and political objects in view and the first issue which will be published on the 1st July will contain several half-tone illustrations. Such illustrations and excellent typography and general get-up will be some of the special features of the paper. One of the objects of this publication would be to bring the Urdu Press in contact with the specialities of European and reformed Turkish newspapers. Excellent Turkish type has been obtained for this Journal, the whole of which will be printed on Art paper. There will be seven or eight parts in each number, containing literary and political contributions. Its columns will particularly contain the fullest summary of the Mail from the Islamic world about the War in Tripoli and the Persian crisis, and several illustrations and maps relating to these countries will be published in each number. This will be the first journal of its kind published in Urdu and will be a unique feature of Urdu journalism.

Annual Subscription Rs. 8.
Students' Rate Rs. 4-12-0.

Al-Hilal Printing and Publishing House,
7-1, McLeod Street, Calcutta

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے مختصر حالات

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ ۲۳ سال سے جاری ہے اور ہندوستان کے معلموں میں کافی ایک نامی اور شہرت حاصل کرچکا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں اسکول لیونگ تک تعلیم ہوتی ہے اور اسپیشل کلاس بھی موجود ہے۔ علامہ الکریزی کے مذہبی تعلیم اور بالخصوص ترجمہ قرآن شریف کی تعلیم ہر ایک طالب علم کے لئے لازمی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کا اپنا عظیم الشان اور خوبصورت مکان بلکھا ہے لیکن بوجہ قریبی اسکول کے توسیع عمارت کی ضرورت اور ہٹتی جاتی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے ساتھ ایک بورڈنگ ہوس بھی ہے جہاں ہندوستان کے ہر صوبہ کے دو سو سے زیادہ بورڈر رہتے ہیں جنکی تعلیم و تربیت کا پورا انتظام ہے اور قریب سو کے قریب غیر کے طلبہ ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں ایک لائبریری اعلیٰ درجہ کا کتب خانہ ہے جس میں دو ہزار سے زیادہ الکریزی کی اور دھائی ہزار سے زیادہ عربی فارسی و اردو کی عمدہ اور اعلیٰ درجہ کی کتابیں ہر علم کی موجود ہیں اور طلبہ میں کتب بینی کا مذاق پیدا کیا جاتا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں علامہ مطہرہ کتابوں کے ایک ہزار کے قریب عربی فارسی کی لائبریری پوری خورق و نامی کتابیں سلاطین مغلیہ کے فرا میں اور عمدہ اور لاد خورق کی تعلیم موجود ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں طلبہ کے ورزشی کھیلوں کا انتظام موجود ہے۔

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے طلبہ کو الکریزی اور اردو تقریر سکھانے کو تہنیت کلب موجود ہے جہاں ہفتہ وار تقریریں ہوتی ہیں۔ ہندوستان اور صالک اسلامیہ کے عربی فارسی اور الکریزی اخبارات آتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں صرف لکھنؤ ملازمین کا خرچ ایک ہزار روپیہ ماہوار سے زیادہ ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں قریب سو روپیہ ماہوار غریب طلبہ کو بطور امداد کے وظیفہ دیا جاتا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے تمام مصارف صرف قوم کے متفرق حصہ سے پورے ہوتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں توسیع بورڈنگ ہوس کی سخت ضرورت ہے۔ اگر بورڈنگ ہوس میں جگہ ہو تو مسلمان طلبہ کی تعداد ہر جگہ سے زیادہ ہو سکتی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے بورڈنگ ہوس کا خرچ بہت قلیل ہے یعنی صرف آٹھ روپیہ ماہوار میں تمام مصارف بورڈنگ ہوس جاتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے طلبہ کے علاج کے لئے ایک اسمتھ سول سرجن اور کمپونڈر کو لاس ملتا ہے اور ہر صوبہ طبیہ و ملی کے ساتھ یا تہہ طبیب مستقل ملازم ہیں۔

محمد بشیر الدین منیر اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ

بابت ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ء

موسم بہار کا دورہ تو سال میں ایک ہی بار ہوتا ہے۔۔۔ لیکن ہمارے ماحولی جدید ضمیمہ سال ہر میں بارہ مرتبہ شائع ہو کر اپنا گھٹ لگا رہتا ہے۔۔۔ چنانچہ حسب معمول تازہ ہفت روزہ ضمیمہ بابت ماہ جون سنہ ۱۹۱۲ء بغرض ضمیمہ طبع شائع ہوا گراموں میں پیش کیا جاتا ہے۔۔۔ اور واضح رہے کہ یہ سال حال کی آٹھ گھنٹہ کے اعلیٰ ترین رکارڈوں کا مجموعہ میں چھپنے لگا ہے۔۔۔ اور مقبول گانے والوں کے عجیب و غریب الموزیکل تہ تیاریاں ہیں۔۔۔ بے د طرفہ رکارڈ۔۔۔ ۱۔۔۔ الی والے جن میں چیدہ چیدہ اور منتخب گانے ہیں۔۔۔ ۶۔۔۔ گونہوں کے گانے ہیں۔۔۔ ٹیسٹ فی رکارڈ۔۔۔ تین روپے۔۔۔ ان کے علاوہ اور گانے بھی ایسا ہی موجود ہیں۔۔۔ (۱) (محمہ حسین ماسٹر اے۔۔۔ ہارمولیم) کوں ہے جو اس سے رالف نہیں! یہ اپنے طرز کا ایک ہی گانے والا ہے جیسا کہ لاجواب گانے دہائی ہارمولیم بھی بجاتا ہے۔۔۔ اس کے رکارڈ تیار کیے ہوئے ملے ہیں۔۔۔ (۲) (موج الہین) یہ وہی پروڈیوسر موج الہین ہیں جن کوئی موسیقی میں کمال حاصل ہے ان کے گانے کی آواز داد نہیں دے سکتا۔۔۔ (۳) (پہارا صاحب) ان کا کاٹ نام اطراف میں بہت مقبول ہے۔۔۔ (۴) (سہراب جی) انگریز کمپنی کے سہراب جی ایک نامور ایگزیکٹو ہیں۔۔۔ جن سے بچہ بہت رلف ہے ان کے گانے میں غصہ کی لہر جاری اور ہائی غیری موزیکل ہے۔۔۔ اور سہراب جی موزیکل تو ان پر قول فار کیا ہے۔۔۔ (۵) (سہراب جی) یہ رکارڈ اچھوتی الہاز سے سہراب جی دیکھو لے بنایا ہے۔۔۔ مزاحیہ حاضر جوابی اور موزوں پہنچان سننے والے قابل ہیں۔۔۔ (۶) (تعلیم حسین لکھنوی) شہنائی الہا بہر میں ان سے بہتر کوئی نہیں بجاتا سکتا اور کمال یہ ہے کہ بچہ وقت ایسا معلوم ہوتا ہے کہ کوئی خوش الحان ہی نہ ہوتا ہے۔۔۔

پرسنل گراموفون گھنٹہ گھنٹہ
پرسنل گراموفون گھنٹہ گھنٹہ

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh, B.A., LL.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry a young, handsome and educated girl of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta

Ladies' Veil

(Burgas).

Latest invention, quite up-to-date.

Best Purdah Keeper.

Most comfortable and easy wear.

SEVERAL AWARDS.

APPROVED BY

H. H. The Begum Sahiba of Bhopal.

Can be had for Rs. 10

FROM 14

Khatoon Stores, Delhi.

ہندوستانیوں سے زیادہ بوزدین
آرام صنعت و حرفت کی قدر کر رہی
ہیں خاتون اسٹور دہلی کی دستکاروں
و نفیس آرائشی سامان سے ان کے کمرے
سجائے جاتے ہیں۔۔۔ جنہر اسکو متعدد
انعام طلائی و نقرئی تمغہ مل چکے
ہیں۔۔۔

زبانہ اہتمام میں۔۔۔

خواتین و ان کے بچوں کے خوشنما و
آرام دہ لباس دیکھ کر غور و بات خواہ۔
داری تیار ہو کر مناسب قیمت
پر فروخت کی جاتی ہیں۔۔۔

29-6-12.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN
TYPOGRAPHICAL
DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

WANTED

A Mohamedan Graduate

To teach a boy aged 16 years preparing for the Entrance Examination of the Allahabad University. The post is temporary. Pay Rs. 30 with free quarters. For particulars apply to—

SYED KHURSLED.

Assistant Engineer, Ambaji-Taranga
Light Railway,

Timba Office,

Post Sattana,

13-7-12 (Mahikanta Agency) and Mehsana.

The Regular Homoeopa- thic College,

11 F-2, Bowbazar Street, Calcutta.

Opened last year by the High Potency Homoeopath, Dr K C Nag, M.D., late Professor of "Organon" and "Materia Medica," Central Homoeopathic College, Calcutta, for teaching pure Homoeopathy. Most complete course of four years (H) I. M., S. & (II) M.B. titles. Most regular lectures. The Staff most experienced and efficient and includes Drs Younan and I. M. Mullick. Best lectures in "Materia Medica," "Organon" and "Chronic Diseases." A large Hospital attached. Practical demonstrations in class. Dissection arranged. Evening Classes. A few free Studentships for deserving Mohammedan students. Rooms fitted with electric lights and fans. "Lectures begun on the 17th June" Apply to the SUPERINTENDENT at 47, Cornwallis Street Calcutta. 22-6-12.

In Aid of

The

Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman
of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

No. { 9-12524.

{ 9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of
The Gramophone Company,
Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A. :—

"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth."

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Houtama, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopedia of Islam :—"Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstoi :—"The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews :—"Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the 'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and Rs. 4-8 or 6s. for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,

REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Quadian, Punjab.

5-10-12.

DO YOU WANT TO EARN Rs. 3 A DAY.—

Reliable persons will be provided with Constant Home Work on DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS by Hosiery Manufacturers. Experience Unnecessary—Distance Immaterial.

DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS are easy to learn. We show you how to work the machine—to make the Hosiery, which you do at home. We purchase the finished work and pay you handsomely.

WHAT OTHERS SAY.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-Knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your Knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,

Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W. Calcutta.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—MORRIS

Vol. 3. Single Copy
No. 26. Annas 4.

Calcutta : Saturday, June 29, 1912.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS

	PAGE		PAGE
THE WEEK ...	571	PERSIA -
ANCHORAGE ...	574	News of the Week ...	584
TETE A TETE—		Persia and the Trans Persian
“Another Whale” ...	575	Railway ...	584
An Earlier “Capture” of		Russian Advance in Persia ...	585
Zanzur ...	575	Persian Women ...	586
Lord Crewe’s Pronouncement	576	LORD KITCHENER’S REPORT ON
The Presidential Contest in		EGYPT ...	587
U. S. A. ...	576	THE WAR SUPPLEMENT—
An Appeal ...	576	News of the Week ...	589
TURKISH RELIEF FUND ...	576	News by the English Mail ...	589
LEADING ARTICLES -		Situation in Albania ...	590
Islam in Russia I ...	577	The Reform Commission ...	591
Some War Publications. III ...	578	With the Turkish Forces in
Egypt ...	580	Tripoli ...	591
LIFE IN AMERICA I ...	581	Interview with Signor Giolitti ...	591
MOROCCO—		The Expulsion of Italians—
News by the English Mail ...	582	Turkish Official Explanation ...	592
The End of a Troubled Reign ...	582	Italian Official Reply ...	592
France and Spain in Morocco ...	583	Suggested Conference ...	593
		Appeal for Destitute Arabs ...	593
		ADVERTISEMENTS ...	594—596

The Week.

Labour Unrest.

A MEETING of railway men at Stratford which expected an order to strike in support of the dockers, in accordance with the resolution passed on the 24th instant, was surprised by the leader appealing to the meeting not to strike. They said their attitude was the result of an interview they had had with Mr. Asquith yesterday, when a settlement of the dockers' strike was foreshadowed. Mr. Ben Tillett upbraided the railwaymen for “cowardice.” He said the dockers would nevertheless continue the strike for a month, if necessary; it would be murder if it lasted longer. A Manifesto published by the Executive of the amalgamated railwaymen reminds members that they are bound to observe the contract with the companies.

Three million bushels of grain are held up in Australia owing to the London strike. Vessels are refusing to take grain as cargo.

The Strike Committee, after an exchange of views with other ports, has decided to recommend the resumption of work when the Arbitration Commission meets.

India Bill.

The House of Lords passed the third reading of the Government of India Bill on the 24th June.

Lord Curzon said he was informed by an expert that if the historical pictures in Government House, Calcutta, were removed to Delhi, the climate was such that they would be doomed to destruction. His Lordship severely criticised paragraph 3 of the Government of India's despatch, and called attention to the conflicting interpretations thereof given by Lord Crewe and Mr. Montagu. It was significant that it was the latter's view which was taken in India.

Lord Crewe said that he first desired to remove a misconception in India arising from the proviso (a) in Clause One, which was interpreted as placing the Governor of Bengal in a position inferior to the Governors of Bombay and Madras. He stated categorically that such was not the case. “We have been at great pains to secure equality in every way. The sole power reserved is, that until a change is made with reference to the High Court in Calcutta, the Viceroy will continue to appoint acting judges of the High Court, which now includes Behar, and for that reason it was deemed advisable that the appointments should be made by the Governor-General and not by the Governor of Bengal. That is the sole effect of the proviso.” Lord Crewe stated with reference to the new city of Delhi, that the site had been provisionally fixed as follows.—Drawing a line about south-west by west from the Jumma Masjid, the main Government buildings and Government House will be on a high ground with a park of about a thousand yards between them and the walls of Delhi. Some buildings will be on the edge of the park. Government House will be on a higher ground further back as it is at present. It is intended that the site of the camp shall not be utilised. Provision will be made for a Military Cantonment. There is no reason to suppose that it will be of very extravagant size. Regarding the argument that the Government of India ought to have remained in Calcutta till the new Delhi was ready, Lord Crewe recalled the desirability of avoiding confusion of duties and responsibilities between the Government of India and the Governor of Bengal under more difficult conditions than hitherto. In his view there was also a further reason for the change in the character of the reception the inhabitants of Calcutta had given to their proposals.

As regards the pictures, though he would gladly listen to any representations, he would think that the dry clear atmosphere of Delhi would be better for them than the atmosphere of Calcutta. With regard to Lord Curzon's criticisms of the despatch he would venture to say that if he could collect the various allusions to the subject in the speeches of Viceroy and Secretaries of State, “We would often find expression of hopes, that with the growth of education and sense of responsibility, more influence and actual power might be placed in the hands of Local Governments and bodies than is possible at present. There is a certain political school in India of Indians altogether free from the taint of disloyalty, who, while agreeing that India must remain under British rule, look forward to something approaching the self-government enjoyed by the Dominions. I say quite frankly I see no future for India on those lines. I think the experiment is an impossible one to try. Consequently it is my duty standing here as Secretary of State for India to repudiate altogether that reading of the Despatch which implies anything of the kind, or that it is the hope or goal of the policy of His Majesty's ministers or the present Government of India.”

“I cannot put the matter more forcibly. I do not complain that some men hold this ideal which is a revolutionary one, though not in an odious sense, of the desire to break up the British Empire but I can only say that I hold it in no sense myself.”

Lord Crewe continued: "I do think it is our duty to encourage every reasonable and possible want or desire on the part of the inhabitants of India to participate in the further management of their own affairs. I am sure Lord Curzon never attempted to discourage the aspirations of the Indian people for greater opportunities of work in the public services."

Lord Cromer said that he welcomed the statement, that whatever concessions were made in future there was no intention to release our paramount hold on India.

Lord Curzon said that they now had a perfectly clear statement from the Secretary of State. It was a most emphatic and most unmistakable repudiation of the interpretation placed on a sentence in the Despatch in question.

In the House of Lords on the 25th June Royal Assent to the Government of India Bill was announced.

China.

Reuter wired from Peking:—The mixed Brigade at Mukden mutinied on the 20th June. Shooting continued throughout the night and several banks and jewellers' shops were looted and burned and hundreds of houses destroyed. The lives and property of foreigners were scrupulously respected. Women and children took refuge in the British Consulate. All is quiet to-day but the shops are closed. Reuter wired from Hongkong. A detachment of the 170th Baluchis has proceeded to Canton in anticipation of trouble there.

Reuter wired from Paris.—The Chinese Loan Agreement has been accepted by the Russian delegate subject to the approval of his Government. The latter has acquiesced with a slight addition which all the delegates have accepted except the American, who has referred to his Government. The matter is thus settled subject to confirmation by Washington. Reuter wired from Paris.—The Chinese Loan Agreement has been signed. There will be further meetings of the "Six-Power" bankers to discuss future arrangements as necessity arises. Further conversations are also probable with Peking to ascertain the views and requirements of China. Although as a general principle each Power will have to find its share of the loan in its own market each has a right under certain conditions to find a part abroad.

The Times in an article upon the condition of China and the proposed loan asks what can be the value of any safeguards for the legitimate expenditure of the loan when the authority of the Central Government is inadequate to enforce the most solemn treaty obligations upon the provinces. The Times deprecates the hasty hazarding of British money on the mere chance that things may ultimately come right. "Still less," it says, "do we wish to see British financial interests further involved at the risk of finding ourselves ultimately drawn into active intervention for their protection."

Reuter learns that as a result of the care taken to eliminate everything of a political character, the Chinese Loan Agreement contains no reference to the special interests of Russia and China, but it cannot be ascertained whether the reservations of Russia and Japan in this respect are still maintained or whether they have been withdrawn. While the general idea is to lend sixty millions sterling, the groups are in no way bound to the sum. When, how and to what extent advances will be made will depend upon how far, in the opinion of the bankers, they are warranted by the situation in China. In any case the loan will probably be spread over a period of five years.

The Washington State Department learns that China has rejected the "Six-Power" Loan probably owing to the proposed foreign supervision of expenditure.

Tibet.

In the House of Commons Mr. Montagu replying to Sir J. D. Rees, who asked whether it was proposed to adopt measures to bring the present unsatisfactory state of affairs in Tibet to a conclusion, stated that Government did not propose to take any steps of the kind suggested. There had been no change in the policy of His Majesty's Government with regard to Tibet.

The Dalai Lama left Kalimpong at a quarter-to-five on the morning of the 24th June in his palanquin, draped in yellow. The start was made at 3 o'clock. The procession consisted of Lamas and Tibetan laymen, all mounted and in a variety of costumes. A mounted Lama, a band of kettledrums, and other musical instruments preceded the chair. The drums only were beaten owing to the inclemency of the weather. There were several Europeans assembled at his house and remained till they had wished him bon voyage. At his departure there was a regular carnival. All his closely attached ministers left with him. A police escort formed a guard-of-honour and will, it is said, accompany him to the frontier. The Dalai Lama will make all haste for Chumbi and stay there three days, and stop for a similar period at Pharijong, then proceeding to Khangma, and talking a short cut for Tsakoolinkha, one mile from Lhasa. One hundred mounted infantry have reached Chumbi and one hundred more soldiers have reached Gyantse. They will meet the Dalai Lama at Langtmand and Khangma respectively.

The tribes to the westward of Yalong Kiang on the Tibetan border have revolted. Hsiangoheng has surrendered to the Tibetans who have obtained 150 rifles and twenty thousand cartridges, in exchange for provisions. The Chinese expedition has halted at Tachienlu and is awaiting reinforcements.

Chinese Opium.

In the House of Commons Sir J. D. Rees asked a question with reference to Chinese illegal prohibition of Indian opium trade.

Mr. F. D. Acland replied that the Government had taken the most serious view of the situation created, and Sir John Jordan, British Minister in Peking, was making strong representations to the Chinese Government whose inability to enforce the observance of recognised Treaty obligations both in this and other matters in the provinces, must, so long as it continued, delay the recognition of the new Government.

Afghanistan.

News received in the Kurram valley confirms the report from Kabul that the Khosht rebellion is at an end. A small contingent of Ghilzais who joined the Mangals are said to have returned to their own villages and the local tribesmen have sent in their Jirgas to discuss matters with the Afghan Military authorities. A new Governor has apparently not yet been appointed and military officers are engaged in making a settlement.

Sanitation in the U. P.

The United Provinces Government have framed rules for the constitution and functions of the Provincial Sanitary Board. The Board will consist of nine members. The senior officer of the Civil Service (President) and the Chief Engineer, Public Works Department, Buildings and Roads Branch, the Secretary to the Government in the Financial Department, Secretary to the Government in the Judicial Department, the Sanitary Commissioner, the Sanitary Engineer and three non-official members, of whom two will be Indians appointed by the Government for a term of three years. The Board will give advice to the heads of Government Departments, Commissioners of divisions and others, and will be central and the controlling authority over all matters of sanitation. It will further assist local authorities in every way in matters falling within its province, and also assist these bodies with grants-in-aid of sanitary works from funds placed at its disposal by the Government.

The New Delhi.

The Delhi experts have drawn up a comprehensive "lay out" plan of the New Capital. It is understood that the plan has been accepted. A small local Government will now be created at Delhi and preparation of the projects will be taken in hand. The experts are being ably assisted by the officers of the Indian Public Works Department.

In view of the fact that the permanent site for the new capital has been fixed it is quite probable that the extent of the temporary works at Delhi will be substantially reduced and this question is engaging the attention of the Government of India and the Secretary of State. It may be recalled that in the recent debate on the Government of India Bill special reference was made to the expenditure on temporary Delhi. Colonel Cole is shortly expected in Simla.

In the House of Commons on the 25th June, Mr. Montagu, replying to Captain Murray, said that the Delhi town-planning experts were submitting a preliminary report on their return to England shortly. They would again visit India in the winter.

Anecdote.

M. MASPERO, the famous French Egyptologist, tells in some reminiscences of an amusing experience which befell him on one occasion when bringing an Egyptian mummy to Europe. It was the mummy of a king, and an important contribution to archaeology, and M. Maspero fancied that the French Custom House officers would not insist too rigidly upon payment of duty. The first of these functionaries whom he encountered, however, insisted upon doing his full duty. He opened the box which contained the mummy, and exclaimed—

"Halloa, what have we here?"

"A Pharaoh—a genuine Pharaoh of the sixth dynasty" said the scientist.

"A—A Pharaoh?" said the puzzled officer. "I don't seem to remember what the duty on Pharaohs is."

He set to work to look up "Pharaohs" in his tariff schedule but found no such article entered in his list.

"This importation," said the officer, finally, "does not seem to be provided for under the statutes. We shall have to follow our usual rule in such cases, and class it with the highest-rated article of the kind that it seems to belong to. I shall classify your Pharaoh as dried fish."

TETE À TETE

THE fairest exponent, generally, of the views of the English middle classes, and although somewhat Toryish in politics, Punch has dealt far more fairly with the occurrences in Tripoli and Persia than the

"Another Whale"

Liberal Foreign Secretary, not to mention the Thunderer of Printing House Square. One of its first cartoons about the Turco-Italian war depicted the utter amazement of an Italian officer in Tripoli on reading of a war in China "with battles." Many months have passed since then and evidently Punch is even more disgusted to-day with the methods of Italian warriors. After failing to effect anything in Tripoli, and giving up the attempt to force the Dardanelles after the loss of one battleship sunk and some others damaged, when Italy raided some of the tiny Turkish islands in the Ægean, Punch could not repress its disgust any longer, and Raven Hill's excellent cartoon, entitled "Autolycus in the Ægean," was published in the issue of 22nd May last. Autolycus was, of course, the craftiest of thieves who stole the flocks of his neighbours and changed their marks, or, in other words, "annexed" them. The caricaturist depicted an Italian fisherman standing on the Ægean at a depth of some six or seven inches. A small basket is slung across his shoulder and contains some small fish marked Rhodes et cetera. He holds aloft in one hand a trident which has pierced through a tiny little fish, while the other hand holds a trumpet through which the triumphant "Snapper-up of Unconsidered Trifles" blows the message, "Another Whale! Let 'em know in Rome!" On the shore near by a sleek Turk squats under the Crescent flag, shrugging his shoulders à la française, with a distinctly merry smile spreading all over his features. It seems that these little fishes are a dædæratum for the hungry populace of Rome which had been promised a land flowing with milk and honey in a few weeks' military promenade. About a fortnight ago the Italian Autolycus turned his attention from the Ægean once more to Tripoli, and caught "another whale"—on land! That was the battle of Zanzur. Baron Reuter, the accomplice after the fact of the new Autolycus, wired—of course, "from Rome"—that "the Italians after prolonged inactivity have resumed offence in Tripoli." The good Baron did not specify the offence, and it is just possible that in wiring of the offence that was resumed in Tripoli "after prolonged inactivity," he was only alluding to the breach of the commandment, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." Anyhow, the Baron assisted him in "seizing" Zanzur. But the writers of the official Italian despatch were evidently a little out of practice, and while "defeating" the Turks and "storming the heights with bayonets," they contented themselves merely with the "capture of the edge of the oasis." As for the losses, apparently they couldn't wake up their minds at such short notice, and left the dimensions of the "whale" to that redoubtable commander—who will live in history as long as Nero—General Caneva. Shortly afterwards, that hero of the holocaust of last October, killed a thousand Turks and Arabs and wounded an "enormous number." And his own bill of cost for all this slaughter was a paltry 31 killed and 263 wounded. At this rate there shouldn't have been many Turks and Arabs left to dispute the "annexation"; yet only four days later, the Turks and Arabs "surprised the Italians at Homs" on the 12th instant. But the sequel was evidently more surprising than the surprise itself, for the Baron continues—"from Rome"—that thereupon "the Italians made counter-attacks on their flanks and rear with all available force, cutting the Turks into two bodies, routing one and surrounding and annihilating the other at the oasis." General Caneva was a trifle less bloodthirsty on this occasion, for only "421 bodies were found", though "there were many other Turkish dead on the line of flight." The bill of cost did not show much originality, for the Italian killed were again 31; but a variation was made by reducing the wounded to 39 only. Here indeed was a lie circumstantial, and it would have taken in anybody, were it not for the fact that we have all supped full of lies for the last nine months. However, to reassure the pessimistic among our readers we cabled to Constantinople and once more sought the assistance of Field-Marshal Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, requesting His Excellency to cable to us the details of these engagements at our cost. Evidently the War Minister—who has always seen to it that no exaggerated account of Turkish successes and no extenuation of Turkish reverses should be issued from the War Office—waited till he had received detailed despatches from the field before replying to our cable. But در آید درست آید and the following account which we have been able to obtain from a somewhat mutilated telegram, would show how abominably the raiders of Tripoli have lied this time. As Prince Hal said to Falstaff, "Mark, now, how a plain tale shall put you down."

"WAR OFFICE, Constantinople, June 24.

"In reply to your telegram of 12th June, the Italians attacked our troops defending Zanzur with a force composed of six batteries of artillery and two and a half divisions of troops. In addition they were supported by the guns of the fleet. The Italian forces were five times as numerous as our own. The battle lasted seven hours continuously. Our position being rendered unfavorable by a lateral bombardment from the fleet, the engagement ended by our withdrawal in order to avoid useless loss of life. In spite of the enemy's extreme superiority and numerous hand to hand encounters, our troops held the position by heroic resistance, and retired only after the order had been given, with one hundred and fifty killed and some three hundred wounded. The enemy's losses were more than a thousand killed. On the morning of 12th June our forces at Homs attacked the enemy's fortifications from two sides. On the ruins of the fortifications of Lebda there were eight series of barbed wire, but in spite of them the attack was pushed on, notwithstanding mines, and gun, rifle and machine gun firing and other obstacles. None of the defenders escaped. Several flags and a very large quantity of arms and military stores were captured and the guns were destroyed. In the meantime another Ottoman detachment advancing along the sea-shore surprised the enemy's reserve in their tents and annihilated the majority. During the long time occupied in destroying the additional obstacles generally, the enemy's reserve in the town and on Markab (Marghab) hill rushed to the help of Lebda, but were thrust back no less than seven times by our troops, and the field was filled with killed. It being impossible to remain at Sidi Barak, Markab or in the town of Homs under the batteries and the firing of the fleet, our men retired after completely burning the provision and ammunition depôts. The enemy's losses were more than a thousand, including seventeen officers. On our side nearly a hundred were killed and two hundred wounded. "MAHMOUD SHEVKET"

A PERSIAN proverb has it that "a liar has no memory", and this is well exemplified in the case of this "capture" of Zanzur. What Reuter wired was by no means the virgin "capture" of Zanzur, for it has been "captured" almost as many times as there has been a "bombardment" of Zuara. We give below a graphic account of an earlier "capture" from Mr. Bennet's book, which we are reviewing elsewhere. Shortly after daybreak on the day in question (December 17, 1911) an Italian column left the line of trenches near Fort C and moved westwards along the Gargareh road. This reconnaissance in force was composed of the 50th Infantry Regiment and a portion of the 73rd, with four squadrons of cavalry and a battery of mule guns. The brigade moved cautiously along, and at length reached Zanzur, which was occupied by a small Turkish picket of four men, who retired. The Italians, having "captured" Zanzur, destroyed the telegraph office and cut the wire. The Italians are surely the only troops in the world who would have waited more than two months before they could summon up courage for this obvious and easy enterprise! The severance of this line broke off telegraphic communication with Zuara, but the damage was subsequently repaired, and I rode into Zavia with a man who carried with him £10 in order to cover the expense. Advancing gingerly to the south of Zanzur, the reconnoitring force suddenly found themselves face to face with an outpost of Turkish regulars twenty in number. One of the twenty had, on the approach of the Italians, been despatched with a report to Senit Beni-Adam. The remaining nineteen stood their ground and opened fire on the enemy, who thereupon retired en masse. I was in the Turkish lines at the time, and everybody, officers and men alike, was highly amused at the almost incredible timidity of the assailants. We were all longing to see them advance against Senit Beni-Adam. No such luck! All we saw was fifteen shells rushing over the desert from the retiring mule battery and bursting 1,000 yards in front of the camp—a sheer waste of ammunition. It was found the same evening that Zanzur had been evacuated, and that the Italians had once more retired within the shelter of their trenches. The Malta correspondent of the Morning Post makes a ridiculous comment on this reconnaissance. He remarks that the importance of this advance lies in the fact that by it the smuggling of arms into Tripoli from the west has been rendered impossible for "the future." How a march to Zanzur and back and the explosion "of fifteen shrapnel in the air could produce such a result he does not explain." Here is a War Correspondent who remarks that the Italians are surely the only troops in the world who would have waited more than two months for the capture of Zanzur. What would he say now that Zanzur has had once more to be "captured" more than eight months after the landing of troops in Tripoli? Anyhow, we hope the Malta correspondent of the Morning Post would discover the esoteric significance of this exploit and tell us in what fact "the importance of this advance lies." We should much like to know what this one has "rendered impossible." Surely not lying!

"If my existence, either officially or corporeally, were prolonged twenty times longer than either of them is likely to be," said Lord Morley, in one of his great speeches on Indian affairs, "Parliamentary system in India is not the goal to which I for one moment would aspire." Evidently Lord Crewe, pressed hard by Lord Curzon and other Tory peers, and not knowing his own mind, has thought it best to play a mild variation on the same theme. In the course of his speech on the third reading of the India Bill in the House of Lords, the Secretary of State for India is reported to have said—"There is a certain political school "in India of Indians altogether free from the taint of disloyalty, who, while agreeing that India must remain under British rule, look forward to something approaching the self-government enjoyed by the Dominions. I say quite frankly I see no future for India on those lines. I think the experiment is one impossible to try, consequently it is my duty, standing here as Secretary of State for India, to repudiate altogether that reading of the Despatch which implies anything of the kind, or that it is the hope or goal of the policy of His Majesty's Ministers or the present Government of India. I cannot put the matter more forcibly. I do not complain that some men hold this ideal, which is a revolutionary one, though not in the odious sense of the desire to break up the British Empire, but I can only say that I hold it in no sense myself." These words were uttered as the authoritative commentary of the Secretary of State on the passage in the Government of India Despatch on the subject of the historic changes announced at Delhi. The passage in question runs as follows:—"It is certain that, in the course of time, the just demands of Indians for a larger share in the government of the country will have to be satisfied, and the question will be how the devolution of power can be conceded without impairing the supreme authority of the Governor-General-in-Council. The only possible solution of the difficulty would appear to be gradually to give the Provinces a larger measure of self-government, until at last India would consist of a number of administrations, autonomous in all provincial affairs, with the Government of India above them all, possessing power to interfere in case of misgovernment, but ordinarily restricting their functions to matters of Imperial concern." This clear and unambiguous passage was, we may take it, phrased with set purpose by its authors to mark the portentous dignity of the changes and the birth of a new era in the history of the country. It would be an insult to the intelligence and sense of responsibility of the Government of India to suppose that they were merely playing with grandiloquent words to cast a glamour round the annulment of the Partition and their flight to Delhi. The words were plainly intended to mean what they mean. Lord Crewe must have understood the very complete and definite vision they held forth about "provincial autonomy" and "self-government" when he blessed the Despatch with his fulsome congratulations. And yet he has been defining the import of the plainest words of the King's English under Tory taunts and Lord Curzon's sneers, till at last he has altogether defined it out of existence. No magician could have wrought a greater illusion of sense. Lord Hardinge's plain, simple words have truly grown to be enchanted, mystic, wonderful. Mr. Montagu had seen the vision which they once conjured and had tried to reach it on the wings of his sinewy eloquence. But his wings were soon clipped in the House of Commons and since then even he has grown, like the words, decidedly mystical. Lord Crewe perhaps thought that by an emphatic pronouncement he would for ever lay all vague hopes to rest. On the contrary he has turned all vague hopes into a sharp, insistent desire. He has sown the seed of an agitation that is likely to spring up in the immediate future and may grow to be as unpleasant as any the country has seen. All that we desire is that it should be possible for all communities to participate therein. Then alone is it likely to result in blessings. It will also show—incidentally—at what strange destination Diplomacy arrives when it undertakes the journey of Statesmanship!

THE Roosevelt-Taft struggle to secure Republican candidature for the American Presidency has entered a stage that may lead to startling and unforeseen developments in American politics. The Republican Convention met in Chicago to elect the Party candidate for final election as President of the Republic.

The issue lay between Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt. The Convention is simply a machine designed to register the decrees of the political bosses. Those who control the machine were in favour of Mr. Taft, because he is conservative by temperament and is afraid of meddling with the huge commercial combines and trusts against which Mr. Roosevelt has proclaimed a ruthless and implacable war. The big financiers and Trust magnates dominate the bosses and consequently the Chicago Convention elected Mr. Taft as the Republican candidate, although Mr. Roosevelt had secured a heavy poll in the preliminaries. This has led to a split in the Republican ranks and Mr. Roosevelt has formally seceded with his followers from the official party to organize a "Progressive" group on the basis of a new, bold and definite platform. He wants to break down the power of the machine and restore freedom of choice and political power to the people. The old American party shibboleths have ceased to have any meaning. It is quite possible new parties may grow up in the immediate future on the lines of English Conservatism and Radicalism. Mr. Roosevelt, with all his cocksureness, egotisms, and sledge-hammer ways, has on the whole stood forth for freedom and justice and his fight for these principles, especially in view of the inseparable vulgarities and subterfuges of American politics, will be profoundly interesting to watch.

We are glad to publish the following appeal received from the energetic Secretary of the Moslem Institute, Calcutta, and hope it will meet with a generous response:—"Everyone is aware of the fact that the number of Muhammadan candidates successful in the various University Examinations is steadily on the increase. It is notorious, however, that the circumstances of the majority are not good, and in the interests of the community it is imperative that they should be properly encouraged and helped in their higher study and research. The Moslem Institute has a Charity Fund under its management from which poor and deserving students are helped with monthly stipends, occasional grants, etc. The new Session is drawing nigh and there have already been many demands on the Charity Fund of the Institute. I, therefore, beg to appeal to all interested in the cause of Muhammadan education to help us in any way they can. All subscriptions and donations to the Fund will be most thankfully acknowledged by the Honorary Secretary of the Institute."

An Appeal.

TURKISH RELIEF FUND.

	Rs.	A.	P.
Mrs Z. Islam Khan, Ghaziabad	2	0
Mrs F Khan	2	0
Ma'har and Sitara	1	0
Muazzam Ali Khan, Esq., Shahzadpur	8	8
Through Wa'ir Ahmad, Esq, collected at Hookul-gani, Benares	6	0
Khalifa Farle Hosain, Saheb (in honour of his son's success in the Entrance Examination)	25	0
Through D. B. Kamat, Esq, Osmanabad, Sholapur, M. M. H. Khan, Esq	4	3
Mohammed Habibullah, Esq	3	6
M. Nisar Ahmed Khan, Esq.	4	3
Minor Subscriptions	1	1
Jamil Ahmed, Esq, Osmanabad (in memory of Jamila Khatun)	15	0
Mrs. Ahmed Said Khan, of Meerut	2	0
M. Taqi Hassan Khan, Esq., Bareilly City	25	0
A Muhammadan Gentleman, Allahabad	12	0
Through Mushir Hosain, Esq., Kidwai, Srinagar—Mrs. Safdar Ali, in honour of her brother's success in the Examination	5	0
Mohammed Khurshed Zaman, Esq., Quetta	10	0
Amount received during the week	126	6
Less M. O Charges	0	4
		126	2
Amount previously acknowledged	19,076	15
		19,202	17

The Comrade.

Islam in Russia.

II

We have often observed that Mussalmans in every part of the world have got to deal with problems that are in their main features the same. Indeed, the very first impression of a student of present-day Islam in its broad social, intellectual, and moral aspects is that the essential factors of the Moslem situation are universal in scope and identical in character. Grave differences in political status, no doubt, exist, but they only serve to bring into prominence all the more clearly the universal nature of the malady that afflicts the various Moslem communities to-day. Political conditions have a great power for good or evil, but they cannot break the structure of a social organism or modify its essential features, however far-reaching and drastic they may be in their operation. Diversity of political status in the case of the Moslem communities is simply a question of facilities or lack of opportunities, of suitability of methods, of the adaptation of means to ends. The Moslem Problem in its essence remains the same, and must find, at any rate in its broad outlines, an identical solution. From Morocco to China and from Northern Siberia to the heart of Africa, amid a variety of political conditions and the influences of race and clime, the spirit of Islam is struggling to be free. The weapons may not in every case be the same, but the nature of the hopes and the character of the efforts are identical. The hopes have found a clear, unmistakable utterance. The accents, though now and then unfamiliar, are understood of all.

The Moslem Problem is neither a political issue nor a social question, though in some of its aspects it includes elements of both. Essentially it is a religious problem. We hope we have made clear the full import of what we mean. The word "religion" has unfortunately not escaped a certain attenuation of meaning in these days of the specialist. It has become a mere technical expression in the hands of the thinker who has begun measuring social phenomena in terms of biology. To the scientific spirit "religion" is merely a form, a ritual, a bald physical satisfaction of some physical need, and he explains it as he would, for instance, explain the existence of claws, the presence of curled moustaches or shaven heads, or the human appetite for pilau or apple pies. Need we say that the vital phenomena described as "religion" cannot be strangled by specialist phraseology? The shadow of scientific dogmatism, however, lies thick across the word, and even the sanest and most clear-headed thinkers feel ashamed of using it without apology. Yet it is the one word that sums up the idealism of man as distinct from the brute realism of his physical environment and the cosmic process that has given him birth. It is at once his achievement and his aspiration. It is his vital life. When we say that the Moslem Problem is a religious problem, we simply mean thereby that the Mussalmans are perhaps the only portion of mankind who accepted certain ideals of human life and purpose as true for all time irrespective of place and circumstance; and their past history, and present condition are to be explained with reference to those ideals. Their future endeavour shall manifestly be inspired by those ideals if the ideals themselves have not become shibboleths. Unlike many varieties of non-Moslem politics that have grown round the nucleus of some secular need out of the stress of economic or political forces and have decayed in the course of history, the various Moslem societies have risen and fallen in pursuit of the same principles, for the Mussalmans had definite and fixed principles for the fashioning of their social and political systems. Those principles have not been strictly followed in practice and the history of the decline and fall of the various Moslem States is in fact due to their falling off from the original standards of conduct, social duty, and moral purpose. Unless they are prepared to sink into the position of a community socially disintegrated, yet held together only by the sense of its helplessness as a despised and fallen people, they must either recover their principles, catch their pristine inspiration and make a fresh effort for progressive social development, or discard them definitely and once for all, merging themselves into the non-Moslem races that surround them. The latter alternative is abhorrent to every Moslem. He feels that he has yet his use in the world as a Mussalman, that his Message is yet half delivered, and that it is necessary for the ultimate good of mankind that it should be delivered throughout the world. In short, he cannot renounce his creed without feeling that he would thereby be beggared of every fine hope and purpose that makes his life worth living. The only course open to him is to remodel his life on the principles that he learnt at the feet of the Master more than 13 hundred years ago. This explains the identical character of the efforts that have recently been made in China, India, Egypt, Persia, Turkey and Russia to liberate the spirit of Islam from the grip of the ultra-secular influence.

Lord Cromer has learnt to think of Islam as a stagnant creed and a fearful obstacle in the way of human progress. He has written of it as a bundle of dead formulas, definitely opposed to the spirit of modern culture, science and thought. His Lordship, however, has the common dogmatism of those who lack the historic sense. He sees a certain social group under certain conditions. He finds those conditions to be decidedly harmful in their bearing on social efficiency and moral progress. Forthwith he concludes that the people are stamped with a ruthless psychology which has made them a species apart—cramped and crippled for eternity. The argument is of a piece with the series of pseudo-scientific reasoning with which "the Asiatics" are often shown to be unfit for the democratic organisations of Europe. The fallacy thrives on a gross unscientific habit of mistaking the accident for the type. The only effective refutation of this kind of arguments is to point out that the Mussalmans who have tasted something of the spirit of modern culture and have received their intellectual training in Europe or in seminaries imparting Western education, remain Mussalmans by conviction; and their love and sense of patriotism for their creed have developed a more robust fibre because their increased intellectual sensibilities have given them a deeper perception of its power, beauty and truth. At the head of every movement for Moslem renaissance in India, Turkey, Egypt and Russia are men equipped with Western knowledge or admirers of Western science and thought, who feel no intellectual absurdity in making an essentially religious appeal to the Mussalmans to rise to the spirit of Islamic teaching, adopt new methods if need be and prepare themselves for the growing synthesis of mankind without losing their individuality.

Every Moslem land has had its Sir Syed, and the spirit of Aligarh has found everywhere its local habitat. The leaders of the new intellectual movement in Russia are men of great strength of character and versatility of mind. Foremost among them are Ismael Bey Gasprinsky, the renowned editor of Tarjuman, and Ahmet Agaëff, the powerful publicist and author on Islamic subjects, who has now become a Turkish subject and has been appointed inspector of primary schools in Constantinople. Ahmet Agaëff had his former centre of activity in Iaku. He has done more than any other single Russian writer to combat the prejudices of the Russian Mussalmans against Western education. By means of lectures, pamphlets and through his writings in the press he has brought home to the Russian Mussalmans that modern science and thought are not opposed to the teachings of Islam and that they must learn what Europe has to teach them if they want to lead successful and honorable lives. Ismael Bey Gasprinsky is the pioneer of what is called "the New Method Movement," i.e., a movement to create a new literature through a reformed language and to found schools in every centre of Moslem life in Russia which would impart sound modern education along with instruction in religion. Ahmet Agaëff created the necessary atmosphere for the success of the Gasprinsky programme. The movement has succeeded in evoking fresh energy and enthusiasm amongst the Mussalmans, and though it encountered fierce opposition at the outset at the hands of the mullahs of the old school, it has outlived that opposition and is now spreading rapidly in every part of the country. It has created and is rapidly multiplying a new and powerful literature in Turkish which has become the literary language of all the different Moslem tribes living in the Russian Empire. This work has been carried on with marvellous energy and devotion for the last twenty-five years and has already resulted in uniting the separate Moslem tribes in Russia into "one Moslem nation" inspired by common hopes, common ideals and the necessity for common endeavour. The overwhelming majority of the Russian Mussalmans are ethnographically of the same stock as the Ottoman Turks. It was, therefore, a wise step on the part of the Moslem leaders in Russia to create unity of intellectual outlook and greater facilities for the diffusion of knowledge by adopting Turkish as the literary language of the people. This purely educational measure has, however, been construed as a political move with the spirit of militant "Pan-Islamism" behind it. The Russian Government has always looked askance at these educational activities; and efforts have from time to time been made by reactionary officials to suppress them. The recent ukase of the Tsar stopping all Moslem schools in Astrakhan is the most violent blow yet aimed at the new intellectual movement by the Russian Autocracy. The plea for these repressive measures has invariably been sought in the existence of what has been called the "Pan-Tjooork" movement. It is alleged that an active undercurrent of sympathy between the Russian Mussalmans and the Ottoman Turks is uniting them for a common political purpose which is full of menace to the peace and security of the Russian Empire. To remove this menace the Russian Government has embarked on a campaign of repression, and its most decisive act has taken the characteristic shape of a summary fiat suppressing all educational institutions. All talks about Pan-Tjooorkism as a political movement are no better than the usual Muscovite bluffs. One might as well regard, and perhaps with much greater reason, the Pan-Slavism of the Christian Russia as a potential danger to the peace and prosperity of Europe. The true inwardness of the motives that lie behind these acts of repression must be sought in the obscurantist nature of the Russian despotism coupled with its deep-rooted prejudice against the faith that still retains its virility and cohesive power, in spite of the fanatical efforts of a Catherine and a Peter to stamp it out of existence. One always thinks of Russia as a country oppressed as if by a hideous nightmare, where the mass of the people drag out lives of distress and of toil, deprived of even the elementary rights of humanity and occasionally serving as food for powder and shot. The Moslem situation in Russia is beset with many dangers. The next few years will reveal the extent to which the Mussalmans are intellectually and morally equipped for self-preservation. They are one of the most vigorous Moslem communities, and the success of their efforts for self-regeneration and self-discipline will react powerfully on the whole Islamic world. From Central Asia to the shores of the Adriatic, in Transcaspia and northern Afghanistan, in the regions of the Caucasus and in Northern Persia, in Asia Minor, in the Crimea and south-east Russia the future of the Moslem communities depends to a very large extent on the success of the "New Method Movement" which has created the "Pan-Tjook" language and literature and is welding the various tribes into a united people for intellectual and moral progress. The educational institutions through which the movement is working form the most important factor of the Gasprinsky programme. A detailed study of the work that is being carried on by these schools will be full of interest and instruction for the Indian Mussalmans.

The ancient mektebs (primary schools) and medressas (high schools), which have for many centuries existed throughout the Moslem world, are being rapidly changed by the Russian Moslems into efficient modern schools for up-to-date secular education. Turkish language is the medium of instruction. The syllabus of studies has been framed on modern lines which has a fairly high standard approaching the programme of the European public schools. The curriculum for secular instruction includes Turkish Language and Literature, Arabic Language and Literature, History of Islam, general History and Philosophy of History, Mathematics (Arithmetic, Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry), Geography, Natural History, Physics, Chemistry, Agriculture, Book-keeping, Hygiene, Psychology, Logic, Method, Calligraphy, Russian Language, and French and German (optional subjects). Religious teaching is compulsory and comprises lessons in Koran, systematic Theology, Fikh (Law), Usul-i-Fikh (Fundamentals of Law), Rules of Morals, Farais (Laws concerning Inheritance), Tefsir (commentary on the Koran) and Hadis and Fundamentals of Hadis. Both the secular and the religious teaching comprised by these curricula are spread over eight years, after which a boy passes to a course of higher studies in the University of Kazan or Ufa. The most important feature of the syllabus is that it combines the liberal as well as the practical aspects of modern education and at the same time gives the Moslem boys a thorough grounding in the principles of their faith and their own secular history. The far-reaching and useful effect of this happy and wise combination can well be imagined. It is surely a great improvement on anything hitherto attempted in Moslem institutions in this country.

The principal centres of the new Method education in Russia are Kazan, Ufa, Orenburg, Troisk and Baku. In Central Asia, Tashkent, Khokand, Andijan and Samarkand are growing in importance as centres of educational activity. Bokhara, the once famous seat of learning in the world of Islam, has lost its ancient glory and is still wedded to obsolete ways and customs. Kazan now holds pre-eminent position as the seat of modern learning and has become the nerve-centre of Islam in Russia. It is also the chief centre of the Moslem press. Many newspapers are issued from the place which enjoy a vast circulation throughout the Russian Empire and in northern Persia and Turkey. The intellectual activity of the place may be gauged from the fact that several hundred new books on Islamic and cognate subjects are published annually with a total of about 3 million copies.

Ufa is the head-quarters of the principal Moslem Ecclesiastical Assembly with the great Mufti as its president. The Assembly administers the Moslem law in accordance with which the family and religious life of the Moslems is regulated. The administration is carried on through a hierarchy of mullahs, imams, and akhunds who are nominated by and are subject to the Assembly.

The Mussalmans of European Russia are generally literate. In many districts the percentage of literacy among them is higher than that of the Russians. In the Asiatic provinces about 50 per cent. of the Moslems must be literate. The number of schools in Russian Turkestan was 6,026 in 1907. Accurate statistical data in regard to these matters are, however, not available. The Mussalman population of European Russia and of the Caucasus theoretically enjoy the same rights as the Christian population of the Empire. They are admitted into military service and civic life and take part in parliamentary elections. They are allowed to act as jurymen and no restriction is imposed on their liberty to enter the government service on equal terms with the Greek Orthodox population. In practice, however, this equality of status is reduced to a mere sham. They are often subjected to harassment by the executive authorities. In spite of their greatest efforts they have not yet been able to secure a proportionate representation in the Duma. "They have no right to be presidents of the district education boards, teachers of humanitarian sciences in Russian schools or school masters in primary schools for Christian children." The Mussalmans in Asiatic Russia "have no courts with jurymen and have no right to send deputies to the Duma." An organised agitation against these disabilities is being carried on most vigorously by the Moslem leaders with the active sympathy of the Russian Liberals. A mosque was recently opened in St. Petersburg with great ceremony and a society for the protection of Moslem interests was organised in the capital. How far their efforts to achieve real equality of treatment will be successful remains to be seen.

The material condition of the Mussalmans of Russia in Europe is as good as, if not better than, that of the Russians. There are great merchants, traders and captains of industry among them. Morally they hold a decidedly higher place in the popular estimation. They are straightforward and self-reliant and their fearless and independent bearing attracts the pagan tribes into the fold of Islam. A Moslem convert at once begins to feel pride in his new social status and becomes a "Tatar", whatever his original tribe may be. A convert to Christianity has, on the other hand, to bear a decided loss in social position.

The future of the Russian Moslems, as we have already observed, depends on the success of their new intellectual movement. The obstacles in their way are many and formidable, but the growing sense of unity and patriotism among them inclines us to believe that their future, through stress and storm, is assured. They are patiently and steadfastly elaborating ways and means for their intellectual emancipation. According to Ismael Bey Ilmimsley, they have fully realised that "the world is constantly changing and progressing and the Moslems are left behind for many miles. We need to create a general awakening of the hitherto sleeping Moslems." The need is clearly general throughout the Islamic world, and the most happy sign is that its urgency has been recognised everywhere. The present day attitude of the Moslem world was summed up in a singularly direct and out-spoken expression of opinion by a leading journal of Constantinople immediately after the Revolution. Said our contemporary —

The Moslem world is in the throes of a regeneration which will affect its social as well as its political conditions, and indirectly must concern its ecclesiastical affairs. It will undoubtedly have the same influence that the reformation of Luther and the French revolution had upon society and culture. The dethronement of these absolute monarchs in three independent Moslem states is a novel chapter in the history of Islam, and calls for grave reflection by the adherents of that faith. The social and economic affairs of a nation, as well as its religion, are closely allied to its politics, and there cannot be serious disturbance in one without having a great influence upon the others. It means either decay or progress, because there is no such thing as rest or stagnation in society. The human race cannot remain in repose. It must either advance or go backward.

Some War Publications*

III.

The main interest of the brochure composed mainly of Mr. McCullagh's articles lies in the massacres between the 23rd and 30th of October. We have no desire to go over the story of the Italian atrocities again, but it is worth while quoting the Italian papers themselves which dealt with the massacres in a moment of candour. In the Stampa, an Italian paper, which is said to be a Conservative and patriotic paper, the massacres were thus described:—

Our soldiers have mercilessly shot down the rebels, who were inspired by the idea that they were dying for their religious convictions. I witnessed several such executions in the discharge of my duties. A man and his wife were found in possession of arms and condemned to death. They held each other lovingly by the hand and betrayed no trace of fear. The woman still kept the hand of the dead husband and calmly awaited her death. A second volley followed and her brains spouted out. Then an old man was shot, and after him a young fellow. Lastly, an old woman was shot. She was stripped naked and they had found cartridges concealed in her garments. Our soldiers are drunk with the lust of vengeance, and the officers have to use all their authority to limit the military executions.

And in the Tribuna of the 30th October, the place where a massacre took place is described as "a field of filth and slaughter", and it is added that "by the fire of our men almost all the inhabitants of the oasis have been destroyed. Every garden has become a cemetery or a great burial pit."

All this and more is corroborated by M. Coassira, the special correspondent of the Excelsior, who writes:—

* 1. The Turco-Italian War and its Problems by Sir Thomas Barclay (London: Constable and Co., Ltd., Rs. 4-6.)

2. Italian Warfare in Tripoli and Eastern Egypt (w. Speight and Sons, Fetter Lane, London. As. 8.)

3. With the Turks in Tripoli by Ernest N. Bennett. (London: Methuen and Co. Ltd. Rs. 3.)

I cannot rid my eyes of it, and am still sick and trembling with fever. Day and night, with unuttered grand eloquence the cannon proclaimed the ubiquity of untiring death. It spared none. But it was not this that upset us, for we were at war; and before coming here we were prepared for the groans of the wounded and the sight of the dead. But who could ever have imagined what we have had to look on? The rush to assassinate, the hecatombs of old men, women, and children, the executions by beheading, the piles of mangled flesh smoking under the wool of the burnouses, like a human incense burnt before the ruined altar of a dearly bought victory. An Arab with eyes full of vengeance muttered: "We were four brothers. Now I am alone, but I must have two Italians for each of my brothers." Whilst going away from the cavalry post, I came upon a hundred corpses thrown against a wall, where they had been shot down in horrible attitudes, all mixed up together. I hurried away to escape the sight and passed an Arab village. A native family was there round a burnt-out fire, where they were about to rot. They were all dead. One little girl had thrust her head into a box, not to see anything, another had fallen back on to a cactus bush. A small white dog was running about amongst the ruins, stopping every now and then to lift up its head and howl (a photograph of this gruesome group is also published). Bullets came whistling fast, and I started away, to find myself near the prison hospital. The prisoners here had revolted and killed the colonel and some officers. Every one of them had been shot, and the walls were besprinkled with brains and prints of hands in blood. Whatever way I take to avoid the corpses, I still find them, round the farms, in the middle of the marketplace—within a couple of hundred yards of the Governor's palace.

It is not necessary to reproduce in detail the horrors of the last week of October in Tripoli, but in the light of what has appeared since then in the Press of Europe it is worth while summarising the verdict of Mr McCullagh. He thinks that "General Caneva erred by over-caution in some directions and by insufficient caution in other directions." He was excessively anxious not to run the risk of another Adowa, of "a disaster which might lead even to the overthrow of the dynasty at home," and the following passage seems to us to give irrefutable proof of this excessive anxiety—

He was overcautious when he posted his soldiers shoulder to shoulder in a semi circle round the town, one end of the encircling line reaching the sea west of Tripoli at Gargareth, the other end reaching the sea east of Tripoli at Sharsheh. While keeping a very strong reserve in Tripoli, he should have attacked in detail the very small parties of Arabs who harassed him and occupied a position far from the town. But his line was in no place more than two miles from the citadel on the water's edge, and at night there were no outposts in front of this line, so that the Arabs could come up to within forty yards of the Italians, while the Turkish artillery amused itself for weeks and weeks by throwing shells into the city. Considering the relative strength of the two armies, this patience and humility on the part of the Italian leader was palpostorous. The Tureo-Arabs numbered 1,500 men, with eight field cannon. The Italians 20,000, with, at the end of October, seven field batteries, nine mountain batteries, ten machine guns, not to mention half-a-dozen men-o-war, and half-a-dozen aeroplanes. Armed with modern rifles any body of soldiers can keep at bay a force three times as great as itself, but here we find an entrenched force compelled to retreat by a force less than one tenth as numerous.

But excessive anxiety for his army's safety becomes in a General a venial offence compared with excessive anxiety for his own safety, and Mr. McCullagh regrets that he must add that "General Caneva was perhaps too careful of his own person." What is one to think of a commander who behaves as General Caneva did, and probably still does, in Tripoli? Mr. McCullagh writes—

He lived in the old citadel of Charles V. and was never visible. He never went about among the troops. He never came into personal contact with the bulk of his officers. Specially after he became convinced that the friendly Arabs were really hostile, General Caneva manifested such a frenzy, as I can only call it, for protecting his own person, that the Arabs, accustomed to look for personal bravery above all things in their own leaders, were filled with contempt, while the Italian soldiers and officers were not much elified. Whenever there was a particularly violent attack from the Arabs outside, the General surrounded his citadel with troops made soldiers lie down in rows on the roof, their fingers on the trigger, made soldiers place sand bags in the lower windows, gateways and doors of the citadel, and lie prone on the ground behind them, as if they were in the firing line. The only reason the Arabs could see for all this preparation was General Caneva's certainty that the desert Arabs would be in the city within a few moments, and his desire to have time to get off in his steam-launch before they rushed the citadel.

In one of the articles that he contributed to the Daily News under the heading, "The Truth about Tripoli," written on the 4th November, Mr. McCullagh had said—

I have met many brave Italian officers, gentlemen in every way, but there are some here who should be drummed out of the army at once. And the first to be drummed out should be General Caneva. . . . For a long time he was afraid to come ashore at all, and remained on a transport. Now he ventures to come ashore in the day time but goes back to his transport at night so as to be able to have a good start in case the Arabs rush the town. But even when ashore, he remains hidden all day somewhere in the huge grey citadel of Charles V. on the edge of the sea. And as soon as the shooting begins at the outposts, hurried preparations are made to put the citadel in a state of defence. The glass of the windows is broken so that the soldiers can fire through. Lines of sand bags are laid at the entrance, and soldiers lie flat behind them, as if the enemy had already broken the line. The roof is crowded with troops. The courtyard bristles with bayonets. The flat roofs of all the neighbouring houses are grey with soldiery. The steam-launch gets up steam, so that if the worst comes to the worst, the generalissimo may be able to make a bolt for it.

After this who can say that Mr. McCullagh is wrong in his conclusion that "such extreme precautions on the part of a Commander-in-Chief have seldom been seen in war since the days when the Byzantine Emperors sent out their eunuchs in charge of armies?"

Where General Caneva was not careful enough was his failure to seize all the arms in the town. This should have been the first precaution to take, yet it was wholly neglected. Incredible as it may seem, he also placed all his soldiers, save his personal guards, out at the front, a couple of miles off. There were no reserves in the town. The policing and patrolling of the city was left to Arab gendarmes who had served the Turks, and who were still allowed to go about with rifles and belts full of cartridges. Mr McCullagh says, "I really think that General Caneva intended to be magnanimous, but a weak man is sometimes magnanimous in the wrong way. He begins with neglect of precaution, which would make a boy-scout laugh, and winds up with a cruelty which would make Abdul Hamid's hair stand on end."

Mr McCullagh admits that Admiral Ricci had issued a proclamation offering to buy arms at a gradually decreasing price, but he contends that no steps were taken to make this proclamation known among the illiterate Arabs. He never heard of it himself although he employed an Arab to bring him all sorts of information, and says that he became aware of it only in Italy after he had left Tripoli. Moreover, he adds that even if this proclamation had been posted up on every house in Tripoli, it was necessary to follow it up with more energetic measures, such as house-to-house search. The offer of money roused the suspicions of the few Arabs who chanced to hear of it, and they thought that if they brought in their arms the foreigners would only punish or shoot them for stealing these weapons. Most of these weapons were the result of the looting of Turkish arsenals which had not all been emptied out before the Turks retired from Tripoli. By the evening of 2nd October, the Turkish troops, with the exception of a few fortress artillery men, had left Tripoli. The Italian bluejackets under Captain Cagni did not enter the town until October 4th. The Jews and the Arabs of the town and the oasis had thus two days in which to plunder the arsenal, the gendarmerie, the post houses, the barracks and even the Konak or Governor's residence. These weapons were stolen not necessarily because the Arabs intended to use them afterwards against the Italians. In the eyes of an Arab, as Mr McCullagh says, a rifle is a jewel of great price, the possession of it is only to be compared to a pedigree stallion, and the Arabs expected to make money by the sale of the rifles and ammunition. When on the 23rd October the Italians were roused from their dream of "friendly Arabs" and began to search for rifles and ammunition, not only was their possession made a capital offence but the possession of a razor, a dagger, a knife or anything that looked like a weapon was also made a capital offence. Up to the 23rd October, Arabs were allowed to accumulate gunpowder and other explosive matter. After 23rd October, they were all put to death if an ounce of explosive was found in their possession. General Caneva issued a proclamation calling on the people to surrender their arms. It was dated 23rd October, though to the best of Mr. McCullagh's recollection it was not published for some days later. But, as he says, by this time the people had become too frightened by the executions which they had witnessed to even dream of surrendering their arms. General Caneva probably thought that he was benignant when he left the inhabitants of the town in possession of their arms, and he imagined that he was a deliverer whom the Arabs welcomed. Thus, Mr. McCullagh points out, was due to the exaggerations of Signor Galli, the Italian Consul, who had been specially sent to Tripoli and ordered to report if things were favourable there for an Italian invasion. This very active, ambitious, over-confident and overbearing man overlooked the difficulties, exaggerated the facilities and persuaded General Caneva that all the Arabs of Tripoli were dying to welcome him amongst them. This is proved up to the hilt by the whole series of the General's proclamations to the Arabs, which talked of the Turkish yoke being taken off from their necks and their marching shoulder to shoulder with the Italians against the common enemy, the Turk. What perfect moonshine all this was can be judged from the fact that while ten thousand Turkish troops were considered to be ample for the peaceful administration of the province, Mahmoud Shevket Pasha was proposing to arm the Tripolitan Arabs, thus showing the confidence which he, an Arab, had in the Arabs of the Western Vilayet of Turkey.

One of the reasons given to explain, if not to justify, the massacres seems to be the alleged treachery of the town Arabs towards the 11th Bersaglieri. Mr McCullagh says that many Italians and a good many English people whom he met were under the impression that these Bersaglieri were playing with the Arab children somewhere far inside what he calls the Italian oasis when suddenly the children's fathers and mothers crept behind them and treacherously cut the soldiers' throats. Nothing, he says, could be further from the truth. In the first place, Mr McCullagh has no faith in the Italian's kindness to Arab children. He thinks that their reported adoption of Arab children, their alleged kindness to Bedouin babies found deserted in the oasis and all other acts of kindness which have been trumpeted by the Roman and Milanese Press, were simply advertising dodges. He writes:—

Until the end of October, the Arab children in the oasis were treated by the Italians as if they were dogs. I have elsewhere shown how at least one such child was left on the ground to die. The Italian soldiers had no more compassion on those children than they would have had on young vipers. But once an outcry was raised about their barbarity, there was a sudden change. The word went forth early in November that soldiers were to be photographed with "rescued" Arab babies on their knees, and that long, sentimental tales were to be attached to the photographs. In this way the English and the Germans, with their curious and inexplicable affection for these dirty brats, would be won over, would be got to believe that the Italians were humane, were bubbling over with the milk of human kindness. Facile Italian pens produced in abundance interminable stories of the heroic Bersaglieri, who had, at the risk of their lives, rescued Turkish infants and adopted them. Lachrymose tales were circulated of rough blue-jackets who shared their food with Arab miles whom they had picked up in the deserts. Photographs were produced by the score showing black children seated at the knees of Italian soldiers, while Italian officers and Red Cross nurses tried to "look pleasant" in the background. London newspaper offices were deluged with these "proofs" of Italian benignity. All this is humbug. It is manufactured stuff, turned out at order for the English, American, and German market. These soldiers would sooner wring the necks of these black children than play with them or treat them on their knees. Besides, even if this sudden affection were genuine, I should have nothing to say in support of it. If the Germans devastated Yorkshire by fire and sword, no Yorkshireman would feel flattered in the least if he saw in Die Woche photographs of German soldiers with "adopted" Bradford children on their knees.

In the second place, Mr McCullagh explains that the 11th Bersaglieri were on the extreme edge of the Italian line, that no Italian force was further from the town than they, and that the attack which inflicted such loss upon them was made by the fighting Arabs from outside. He admits that some Arabs inside took part in it, but most of these also were desert Arabs who had previously traversed the Italian lines in what he calls General Caneva's benignant period. We published some time ago an account of the fighting on the 23rd October and the horrors that followed which Mr. Montagu had contributed at the time, and our readers would probably remember that Mr. Montagu incidentally affirmed from the Turkish side what Mr McCullagh had noticed from the Italian side, viz., that the attack on the Italian rear was made by fighting Arabs from the front who had got through the Italian line, and was not the revolt of the "friendly" in the oasis. What is still more important, Signor Luigi Barzani, the extremely jingoist and anti-Arab correspondent of the Corriere della Sera, admits this himself in an article which appeared in that paper on November 6th. In that article he admits that the attack on the Italian rear on October 23rd was made, after all, by fighting Arabs who had thus slipped through, their rifles concealed underneath their loose flowing robes.

When everything failed, the Italians attributed their barbarities to the feeling of revenge against "Arab atrocities." About this it is instructive to read what Mr McCullagh writes on the subject.—

El-Henni was evacuated by the Italians on October 23rd, having been rushed by the Arabs an hour before daybreak, while the sentinels of the Bersaglieri were asleep. General Caneva did not retake El-Henni until November 26th, more than a month later. How did he know, then, that atrocities had been committed there? The Bersaglieri had fled too rapidly to note what was done with their dead and wounded, yet on the 26th I heard them describing the mutilations which they did not discover until a month later. Considering the extraordinary craftiness and cunning which one sometimes finds in the character of the Southern Italian, and which I noticed myself in Tripoli, we should not be too eager to credit the lurid accounts of Arab ferocity with which, by way of counterblast, the Italian Press has been deluged. Moreover, it is extremely doubtful if the particular mutilations which the Italian correspondents describe with such gusto and in such detail,—it is extremely doubtful if the sewing up of the eyelids, etc., would remain after a month of hot rainy weather. Decomposition would set in very rapidly and would be assisted in its work of destruction by the dogs, carrion-birds and beasts of prey. I have already spoken of the Times military correspondent in Tripoli. I have shown how pro-Italian he has been. Well, writing in Blackwood's Magazine for January 1912, this correspondent thinks that the accounts of the Arab atrocities have been "overstated." "Men who are said to have been buried alive are probably Italian corpses that the Turks hastily interred for sanitary reasons. It is quite possible that some of the so-called mutilations were due to the packs of dogs which infest the oases. Moreover, it is hard to believe that the evidences of brutality, as described in the Italian journals, could have survived in the minuteness of the detail given, after the exposure of a month of North African sun and torrential rain."

On the subject of the massacres Mr Bennett writes as follows:—

The Italian General believed, or affected to believe—the wish was, I fancy, father to the thought—that by some astonishing metamorphosis the Arabs in the oasis had, in virtue of some proclamation which 99 per cent. of them never even saw, suddenly abandoned their allegiance to their creed, their country, and their Khalif. If this conviction was seriously entertained, it affords one more indication of the stupidity and miscalculation which has distinguished this Italian enterprise from the commencement. However, if General Caneva and his officers believed that the natives in the vast oasis had surrendered their rifles and made their submission, they had a rude awakening on the 23rd, and from their point of view, great provocation. A forcible disarmament of all [the Arabs, the trial and punishment of any who had taken up arms after actual submission, deportation of any still under suspicion—any of these courses of action would have been reasonable. No possible justification can be found for General Caneva's monstrous conduct in allowing the rank and file of his army to carry out indiscriminate reprisals for three or four days. This officer will have behind him in Tripoli and the whole Moslem world a name of bloodguiltiness, to be accursed from generation to generation. The history of the Italian Army is adorned with few indeed of the laurels of victory, but its records might at least have remained unspotted by brutal and cowardly massacres.

We do not know how an eminent authority like Lord Roberts could justify the atrocities on the ground of "military exigencies." As the cartoonists of Punch contended, we never hear of "military exigencies" when Turkey has to put down undoubted rebels who, instigated, by foreigners revolt against their recognised sovereign and his government. When Shevket Pasha had taken stringent steps against the Albanians last year, it never occurred to anybody to talk of "military exigencies." If Lord Roberts can justify such horrors as Lieutenant Montagu witnessed with his own eyes, calling them "desperate measures to establish the equilibrium of battle" and say that "such things are unfortunately inevitable in war", we wonder whether we should not credit some of the horrors attributed to Lord Roberts himself and his subordinates in conducting the Boer War. That is, however, a soldier's view, but when a civilian and a pacifist like Sir Thomas Barclay says that he does not think "the time has yet come to speak of 'atrocities' with which the Italian army has been charged", and explains them away with the remark—which well illustrates both the mistake of "general principles" and the error of "special application"—that "war is a hideous affair at the best—specially war with North African tribes in which defeat may be followed by torture and mutilation," we confess we begin to lose hope of Christians and Europeans being ever just to Islam and the East.

Egypt.

LORD KITCHENER'S first report on Egypt as His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General is a record of some good results achieved in the financial administration of the country. The total revenue of the country for the year 1911 was £E16,793,000 exceeding that for 1910 by £E827,000. The receipts yielded a surplus of £E1,921,000 over the actual expenditure. The growth of revenue has been due to the general agricultural prosperity and the normal expansion of commerce. Agriculture is the principle industry of the country and its vital importance has been recognised by the constitution of the Department of Agriculture which has set itself to the task of imparting instruction to cultivators and overcoming the conservative methods of the fellah. Efforts have also been made to improve the cotton seed, and extensive drainage works are to be shortly taken in hand. The Assuan Dam is nearing completion. The Dam will be a remarkable engineering achievement and will afford immense facilities for irrigation and thus enormously increase the agricultural wealth of the country.

Closely allied to the improvement of agriculture is the need for the organisation and spread of mass education. Hitherto the Ministry of Education has been the most unprogressive Department of the State. Lord Cromer, while evolving order out of the financial chaos and maturing far-reaching schemes for the growth of material well-being, had utterly neglected Egypt's intellectual and moral needs. What little facilities for modern education existed had been created by the efforts of the people themselves. The sons of the wealthy and aristocratic classes still go for education to Europe, for there are few institutions in the country even to-day which can provide up-to-date instruction in the highest branches of modern Arts and Sciences. The creation of a well equipped university is the most pressing need of Egypt, and we trust the Government will devote a portion of its huge surpluses to bringing higher education within the reach of the people. It is satisfactory to note that increased attention is being paid to the development of secondary education. An interesting experiment was commenced in 1910 by handing over the control of local education to the Provincial Councils. This was a step in the right direction as has been amply borne out by the great impetus that has been imparted to education. The question of devising effective and comprehensive measures for elementary education is, however, the crux of the educational problem. Lord Kitchener thinks that "what seems most required for progress in the direction is to evolve the best type of rural school, adapted to the special practical needs of agricultural districts, and which this has been done we may confidently hope to see a considerable increase in the number of boys educated. It must not be forgotten that any hasty or unthought-out development of education in rural districts, unless it is carefully adapted to rural necessities, may imperil the agricultural interest on which the prosperity of the country so largely depends. A rural exodus in Egypt would be an economic and social disaster of considerable magnitude. To avoid this contingency, a half-time system of education allowing of labour in the field for the remainder of the day, with holidays fixed in accordance with agricultural necessities, seems the best solution." Lord Kitchener suggests on the whole a sound method of grappling with the problem, which resembles that in use in the rural areas of Baroda, and we hope efforts will be speedily made to organise mass education on these lines. The Savings Banks Project, which has been recently inaugurated for the benefit of the fellah depends for its ultimate success on the spread of mass education.

A very useful reform has been effected in the administration of justice by the institution of Merkaz Tribunals which have brought justice nearer to the doors of the people. These travelling Tribunals of local judges will save the poor cultivators much expense and inconvenience and will dispose of petty cases expeditiously on the spot.

The important feature of the year under review has been the outbreak of the war in Tripoli. There are those who think that Lord Kitchener's appointment to the Egyptian Consulate was a calculated move in anticipation of the Italian comp. The British Foreign Office has not so far denied all previous knowledge of Italian intentions. It has been freely asserted in some of the most responsible organs of the British Press and by some of the most competent observers of international affairs that the British Foreign Office had got an intimation of the Italian design and that Lord Kitchener was consequently despatched to Cairo to impose neutrality on Egypt, maintain order in the country by the prestige of his name and closely watch developments. Be this as it may, the declaration of Egyptian neutrality has not yet been justified on any ground, while the pettifogging rigour with which the neutrality was exercised against the Turks may afford some clue to the character of the Kitchener régime in Egypt. The report speaks of "an extremely warm feeling of sympathy" that has been aroused in the country for "the Muhammadan combatants" on accounts of "the geographical proximity to Egypt of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, the close relationship existing between the people of Benghazi and the Egyptian Arabs, and the bonds of common religion and ties of trade and commerce", and it might well have been added that the Egyptian sympathies have no less been moved by the deep sense of loyalty the people feel towards the Sovereign Power.

A usually well-informed writer on Egyptian affairs has recently drawn a severe indictment of Lord Kitchener in the Manchester Guardian. The writer maintains that under the present military régime at Cairo the Liberal policy for Egypt has been absolutely lost sight of, that the wheels of progress in the direction of self-government have been reversed, and that the whole temperament of the Egyptian administration has been shifted back to a lower grade of morality than any noticed even in the most despotic days of Lord Cromer's one-man-rule. He thinks that Lord Kitchener, whatever excuse may be made for him on the score of instructions, has largely overdone his part. Lord Kitchener has usurped all authority. The Ministers wait on him for instructions, "while the Khedive has abdicated his role of prince and lives in retirement." The Legislative Council has again been reduced to impotence. A repressive campaign has been begun against the Press and the prominent members of the National Party. As for Farid Bey, the leader of the party, "quite recently he has been once more condemned—for a speech delivered by him at a private meeting of his party containing nothing of an inflammatory nature affecting public order but severely criticising the Government and condemning their policy in regard to the war—to the savage sentence of a year's imprisonment with hard labour. At the same time Ali Bey Kamel, the responsible director of the Laws, and Ismail Effendi Hafiz, editor of the Alam, received sentences of three months each for publishing Farid's speech, being charged therewith with 'inciting to hatred of the Government.' After reading this indictment we can understand what Lord Kitchener means when he says "that political feeling has lately been much calmer and the consideration of practical reforms for the good of the country has apparently become more interesting to the majority of the people than discussions on abstruse political questions which are unlikely to lead to any useful result." Kipling thinks that "Judy O'Grady and the Colonel's lady are sisters under their skin." We do not know what "the Colonel's lady" thinks of the subcutaneous analogy. But we are sure Lord Kitchener would like it even less than Lord Curzon if it is suggested that the two are not so far apart in their motives, even if they do differ in their methods. Yet so they seem to be.

Whatever else we may think of it, Lord Kitchener's assurance about the tranquil condition of Egypt will, we trust, take the wind out of the bogus agitation that has recently been started by a number of scare-mongers led by the military correspondent of the Times for the increase of the Army of Occupation. The main function of this garrison is to preserve order in the country, and when Lord Kitchener is fully satisfied with the political situation no earthly case can be made out for increasing Egypt's burdens. Egypt is still a part of the Turkish Empire and we cannot see how it can be made the "training ground" and strategic centre for British troops.

Life in America.

I.

IN THE UNIVERSITY CAMPUS.

IT WAS a misty, chilly morning in February when I was introduced to the Registrar of an American University. In about five minutes I was perfectly at home with him. We talked about my prospective studies in the University and he gave his advice just like a friend, and was so genial that I could not but mark the difference between him and the Registrar of an Indian University. When I went out from the Registrar's office, I felt perfectly easy and wondered at the far-reaching democracy of America, where all men had equal rights.

In American Universities, generally speaking, they have professional colleges of Medicine, Dentistry, Law, Engineering and Agriculture all grouped round a College of Liberal Arts. The courses are based on the credit-hour system, i.e., one must put in a certain number of hours work before graduation. The student can choose his own favourite subjects and put his own genuine enthusiasm into the study of those subjects which express his temperament, his inmost ideal, his life's choice. It seems to me, that we can afford to give a trial to this system of credit-hours and electives in our coming universities and find out how they thrive on the Indian soil.

It has been well said of the Dacca University, that it will be of no use unless the atmosphere can be changed, unless great minds come to live in the campus and raise the tone of life. In America they can do this because of the rich endowments. From the following table we can see at a glance how much they spend on professors and how much on students.

University.	Total Income.	Salary of Staff.	Total Staff.	Expenditure per Student.
	$	$.		$.
Columbia	1,675,000	1,145,000	559	280
Harvard	1,829,789	841,970	573	209
Chicago	1,304,000	699,000	391	137
Yale	1,088,981	524,577	365	158
Cornell	1,082,513	510,931	507	140

We can never hope anything on this scale in the near future. But as a step towards this we must centralize education and that is why movements like those of Aligarh and Benares should be encouraged. In course of time when there is a moral capital, missionaries will go out from these centres and preach the gospel of unity and progress.

Seven-tenths of the universities of America are co-educational. In the classes the sexes number about equally and there exists a sort of healthy rivalry. From a recent report, it is seen that generally the girls show better results than the boys. This shows clearly that the fair sex when given a fair chance can beat even men in their specialized lines. To my mind, co-education has a very wholesome effect and the experiment has met with more success than was at first anticipated.

To some, the American student is an enigma. He is not discovered by a superficial glance and surely not by those who have never lived on a college campus. To find him as he really is, one needs to follow him to his laboratory or lecture room or on some vague walk at night beneath the stars. He is held by the subtle charms of youth, lost in a sense of his own significance, moving about in a mysterious paradise all his own, "full of dumb emotion, undefined longings and with a deep sense of the romantic possibilities of life."

The American college-man worships at the shrine of reality. To him,

The rank is but the guinea's stamp
The man is the gold for a' that.

His sense of squareness is highly developed and he prefers the language of naturalness. His college slang, often absurd, is listened to with respect, but the "stumbling sentences" set a college audience wild with enthusiasm. The whole student mood is light and warm as summer sunshine,

He lives in a period when,
'Tis bliss to be alive.

Rarely does one find revengefulness or sullen hatred in the American undergraduate. When such a man is discovered he is usually shown the way elsewhere either by students or professors.

The present tendency in American universities is to develop professional training. Many fear that students who will be doctors or engineers will not take part in the political or industrial life of the country. That is true to some extent, but there is no reason to be too nervous on this point. The average American student is filled with enthusiasm for civic and social investigation and improvement. He debates with zeal, economics, immigration and labour questions. Indeed, the modern American university is taking increasingly firmer hold upon the life of the nation.

There is one phase in the life of the average American student which is unparalleled in the world. There is no other country on the globe where such a system is practicable. With self-reliant courage, he works his way through college, tutoring, waiting at the table, and performing other real services. But when we see the student and professor working together upon the American farms, bringing about a new and higher type of rural life, we are bound to ask whether the undergraduate is not interested in concrete construction of life by means of ideas made real.

Jews City, U. S. A.

R. AHMED.

Morocco.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, May 31.

It is understood that the latest proposals for the territorial demarcation and future political status of the Spanish sphere in Morocco as drawn up in concert by the French and British Governments submitted to Spain by England have some prospect of commending themselves to the Spanish Government.

With regard to the question of Tangier, Spain is manifesting her keen political interest in the discussion of the internationalization and municipal organization of that place. The negotiations are understood to have established the unanimity of Great Britain and France on a great variety of points. Till very lately there certainly remained some difficulties with regard to the question of the future rights and influence of the Maghzen international administration. I do not know whether they have entirely been removed. It is manifest that the Maghzen will in future be entirely identified with the French Protectorate in Fez and that consequently any rights reserved for the Maghzen would practically amount to an addition to the rights of France.

The Temps protests with some warmth against any idea that France is not wholeheartedly prepared to fulfil her obligation to make the internationalization of Tangier effective and complete. It seems to think that "alarm" and "hesitation" on that point have been expressed by The Times or by its Paris Correspondent and it takes occasion to make the following unequivocal assertion:—

"The internationalization of Tangier is the first limitation which we accepted for our Moroccan policy. We accept it in 1912 as plainly as in 1904. When the word of France is engaged to her loyal friends it can neither be taken back nor discussed."

From the latest despatches received from Fez it is inferred that although the situation remains serious the activity of the rebels has diminished. On the other hand, attempts are being made to preach a holy war. The tribesmen appear to have had a sharp lesson administered to them near Sefru yesterday. The Minister of War, M. Millerand, has stated to a representative of the Temps that in his opinion the situation does not warrant the undue anxiety which has been aroused. The public would have to expect to hear news of further fighting such as was inseparable from colonial expeditions. M. Millerand added that General Lyautey, in whose hands all civil and military power was concentrated, enjoyed the complete confidence of the Government. All the reinforcements for which General Lyautey may ask will be despatched without delay, and the Algerian frontier force is being held in readiness to come into action as soon as the moment for its intervention has arrived.

Two transports are preparing to sail for Morocco to-morrow and on Sunday from Marseilles and Toulon, respectively, with some 7,000 men, several batteries of artillery and a large quantity of war stores. The Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs, M. Poincaré, has addressed to General Lyautey the congratulations of the Government upon the repulse of the rebels and upon the fine bearing of the troops.

The Prime Minister to-day made a statement before the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Chamber with regard to the negotiations which led up to the Protectorate Treaty of 30th March. Two explanatory letters dealing with the Sultan's position, Civil List and place of residence, and with the succession in Morocco, are appended to the Treaty. After explaining their purport, M. Poincaré stated that in deference to General Lyautey's representations Mulai Hafid had consented to defer the question of his abdication. With regard to the rising of the tribes, the Prime Minister declared that one of the principal causes of discontent had been the premature announcement which, owing to a regrettable indiscretion, had been made concerning the signature of the Protectorate Treaty. As regards the future, every confidence was to be placed in General Lyautey, who would receive a free hand. The Moroccan finances were to be reorganized by a competent official.

M. Maurice Long, who was Reporter for the Franco-German Convention of 4th November 1911, was appointed to act in a similar capacity for the Protectorate Treaty, the adoption of which will be recommended by the Committee.

Paris, June 3.

Colonel Gouraud's column returned to Fez yesterday after a series of brilliant operations in the mountainous country several miles north-east of the town as the result of which the rebels have been driven across the Sebu with heavy loss. The artillery again worked terrible destruction in the ranks of the enemy. Generals Lyautey, Moinier and Brulard and El Mokri went out to meet the column, which marched back to camp, headed by the hands of the garrison, through the principal streets of the town. The native population is said to have been much impressed. The total French losses amount to 12 killed and 31 officers and men wounded.

Fez, June 5.

General Lyautey reports that the situation at Fez is now satisfactory.

According to the latest despatches from Fez the country between the capital and Mekinez and thence to the coast is considered safe enough to permit of the Sultan's leaving to-morrow for Rabat, where he may be expected to arrive in about a week's time.

Tangier, June 5.

The situation continues to improve, both in the north and in the south.

The End of a Troubled Reign.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, June 6.

THE Sultan and M. Regnault, with their suites, are reported by a wireless telegram to have left Fez early this morning for Rabat and Tangier respectively.

It is no doubt with feelings of intense relief that Mulai Hafid leaves his northern capital, where his three years' residence has been an eventful and singularly disturbing one. Scarcely was he installed in Fez when some of the responsibilities which he had undertaken in usurping the throne of his brother were forcibly thrust upon him by the arrival of three special missions—those of France, Spain and England. France and Spain had important questions to settle, and only M. Regnault's tact prevented an open rupture with the French Republic, while the relations between the Sultan and the representative of Spain accredited to his Court could not have been worse.

Serious as were Mulai Hafid's troubles from without, they fast became even worse from within. His barbarities and his extortion soon changed the sentiment of affection with which he had been welcomed at Fez as the saviour of his country into one of detestation. Yet during this period he showed praiseworthy energy and met with certain signal successes—successes that were rendered worse than useless by the fact that they were always followed by acts of barbaric cruelty. Intrigues amongst his Court and tribal misunderstandings, added to his misgovernment and extortion, drove the people into rebellion, and Mulai Hafid was benighted in his own capital. There is no need to repeat how last summer he appealed for help to France, the very nation whose troops he had sworn, in accepting the throne, to annihilate. After a splendidly organized and difficult forced march the French column relieved Fez and Mulai Hafid shortly found himself safe, only to become a puppet in the hands of a group of French officers.

From this state of servitude—for it was nothing less—General Lyautey has just released him. It was no wonder that he desired to quit Fez and abdicate. Loathed by his own people, mistrusted by everyone, not even consulted by the French military authorities, he remained impotent in his palace while his tribesmen raised rebellion after rebellion and his troops massacred their officers and pillaged the city. He went in daily fear of assassination, and the terrors through which he passed were rendered doubly horrible by a nervous breakdown. With what joy must he this morning have shaken off the dust of Fez from his shoes and turned back to curse the city from the midst of the strong guard of French troops who accompany him to protect him from his own people. It must be added that the sentiments of the population of Fez towards himself are somewhat reciprocal. But the march to the coast will be a severe ordeal, for the Sultan will pass through tribe after tribe, detested by one and all as the puppet of the very Power against whom he, in order to gain the throne, had proclaimed a holy war, and it will be the French troops alone that will protect him from being torn to pieces by his own infuriated countrymen.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, June 6.

The natives who sullenly watched Mulai Hafid leave his capital this morning cannot but have reflected that the Sultan's departure represented the end of a chapter in the history of their country. The rebel tribes beyond the walls will have realised that the chastisement they received at the hands of Brigadier-General Gouraud's column last week has meant nothing less than the failure of their efforts to rescue the Sultan from what they considered to be captivity. As the Journal des Débats observes:—

"It is the old Maghreb itself that with the Sultan is passing away along the road to Rabat under an escort of infidels. The Emperor of Morocco may continue to be a form which will be respected by international law, but he has completely ceased to have any authority in his own country. The fact is that the religious origin of this authority made it a force which was much more capable of opposing than of seconding foreign influence. The Sultan's part was far more to act as Commander of the Faithful and to preach a Holy War than to counsel arrangements which his people deemed sacrilegious. This circumstance did not allow any very great results to be expected from his co-operation, but it is difficult to see now what he could be expected to do after the series of events which has culminated in his departure for Rabat."

agency of a reformed Maghzen, which will have nothing in common with the old one but the name, we shall ourselves have to conduct the local native policy which is necessary in order to secure the indispensable degree of order in the country."

The Débat likewise discusses the expediency of the proposals for the transfer of the Residency from Fez to the old Imperial town of Rabat, and comes to the conclusion that from the French point of view, it is important that the present capital, which exercises considerable influence on some of the sturdiest sections of the population, should remain under the direct surveillance of the Protectorate authorities.

France and Spain in Morocco.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Madrid, May 24

MORE than twelve months have now elapsed since the first meeting took place in Madrid between the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs and the French Ambassador—the British Ambassador being also present by the desire of both France and Spain—with the object of regulating the future position of the two Powers in Morocco; yet even now the high contracting parties appear to have some way to travel before they can arrive at a definite agreement. It is not rapid work, even for diplomacy. Certainly there have been "extenuating circumstances," but when every allowance has been made it must still be admitted that progress, especially since the advent to power four months ago of the Poincaré Cabinet, in which so many hopes were reposed, has been disappointingly, lamentably slow.

In view of the length of time which has passed since the negotiations began it may, perhaps, be worth while to recall the manner of their origin. As is known, the relations between France and Spain in Morocco are at present regulated by the—until recently secret—Franco-Spanish Treaty of October, 1904—which was communicated to Great Britain, and may be regarded as a corollary of the Anglo-French Convention of 8th April of the same year—and by the General Act of Algeciras. Early last year the increasing disorder at Fez, and the consequent activity of the French in that region, created in Madrid a conviction that whatever might be affirmed to the contrary the status quo in Morocco was passing away before men's eyes, and that accordingly the situation foreseen by Article III. of the Franco-Spanish Treaty had already come into being. In these circumstances the Spanish Government more than once urged that Spain ought now to be free to exercise that liberty of action in the "Spanish zone" which Article III. secured to her in case the status quo were altered. For various reasons France was very unwilling to agree to this proposal, but in view of the increasing nervousness and anxiety manifested by Spain at the French advance on Fez—an anxiety which early in May found expression in the occupation of several strategic points between Ceuta and Tetuan—France agreed to discuss the principal points affecting Spain's position in her zone, in regard to which she desired a freer hand.

On this basis the negotiations or "conversation" began, and three meetings à trois were held in May and June last year. The last of these three meetings took place only a few days before the Spanish occupation of Larache and Alcazar, which caused great resentment in Paris; and as about the same date the British Ambassador was obliged to leave Madrid for London the conversation which had not been without some useful results, was for the time being allowed to drop. Then came the German coup at Agadir, which was welcomed with undignified satisfaction at Madrid as a proof that others besides Spain felt that the changed situation required energetic action. This satisfaction was doomed to be somewhat diminished by the subsequent refusal at both Berlin and Paris to admit Spain as a third party to their deliberations.

Meanwhile Spain, thus rebuffed, proceeded to establish herself more firmly at Alcazar, and the occurrence of one or two unpleasant incidents between French and Spanish officers or officials led to the conclusion of a modus vivendi at the end of July by the terms of which French and Spaniards were to keep strictly within their respective zones. Spain now began to manifest a desire to resume the "conversation" which had been dropped in June, and in spite of the obvious disadvantages of resuming them before France and Germany had concluded an agreement a resumption did actually take place in September, when, for the first time, the French claim for "compensation" in return for the removal of the "German mónage" was presented.

The French territorial claims as outlined at this time consisted of the whole of the Spanish Southern Zone, coast and all, including Ifni—in return for which it was understood that Spain should enjoy complete administrative control in her northern Zone. Spain demurred to these claims on the ground that Ifni was the only tangible result of the war of 1860 and that though she had never yet occupied it she now desired to do so and had so arranged in her treaty of 16th November 1910, with the Maghzen. Moreover she could never cede the coast opposite the Canaries. In the circumstances France invited Spain to make a counter proposal; but though the Spanish Government admitted the principle of compensation, they declared themselves unable to formulate any counter proposal unless France could guarantee that they should not later receive a second "bill" from Germany. This guarantee obviously could not at that time be given and the conversation again lapsed. The French Government subsequently regarded the proposals on which these September conversations were based as having "lapsed" also.

Early in November the publication in Paris of the text of the secret treaty of October, 1904, revealed for the first time to the French public the nature and extent of the Spanish claims in Morocco. A good deal of indignation was manifested, and a section of the French Press perversely vented its ill-humour on Spain towards whom menacing language was used, with hints that if she did not consent to evacuate Larache and Alcazar of her own free will it might be found necessary to find means to compel her. Such language naturally only evoked a corresponding spirit of defiance in Spain, but wiser counsels prevailed, and, owing to the advice of the more moderate men and, above all, to the conciliatory attitude of the French Ambassador in Madrid, M. Geoffray, who in this matter has from the first to last proved himself the best friend both of his own country and of Spain, and whose tact and discretion have more than once saved a situation which looked well-nigh desperate, a draft convention was finally submitted to the Spanish Foreign Minister on 6th December which contained nothing of a nature to wound Spanish susceptibilities. It was understood at this time, on both sides, that with perhaps a slight rectification of the frontier line to the south-west of the river Lucus, compensation should be sought exclusively in the Spanish southern zone.

During the interval which elapsed between this date and the fall of the Caillaux Cabinet in the middle of January several meetings took place at which two points soon proved to be the cruxes of the discussion, namely, the French desire that "general regulations" for the whole of Morocco should be issued by "the Maghzen," which to the Spaniards was only another way of saying "by France," and the question of the control of Customs at Larache and Tetuan. Spain, it should be observed, had early laid down the condition that the question of "compensation" should be postponed until her future position in her zone was clearly defined.

The fall of the Caillaux Cabinet was welcomed in Spain because it was believed, somewhat hastily, that the new French Ministry, however composed, was likely to be more conciliatory to Spain. As a matter of fact, when on 9th February M. Geoffray returned to Madrid after prolonged conferences with M. Poincaré he came authorized to make liberal concessions regarding Spain's administrative and general control in her zone, and almost immediately received instructions to agree to Spain's proposal for the immediate appointment of joint Franco-Spanish Commission, to sit in Madrid, for the examination of the Customs question, provided that Spain on her part would agree to enter forthwith upon the question of territorial compensation. To this Spain agreed.

On the 17th February accordingly M. Geoffray presented the French territorial demands. They contained a claim for Cabo de Agua (occupied by the Spaniards in 1908), which was never regarded seriously in Madrid and was perhaps hardly seriously meant in Paris. At any rate it was never energetically pressed and was eventually quietly withdrawn. The really important claim, however, which produced on the Spanish Government a feeling akin to dismay, was that for the whole valley of the Wergha river. This demand was an entirely new departure, for the portion of the Wergha river assigned to Spain by the 1904 Treaty lies in the Spanish "Northern Zone," whereas Spain has always understood that compensation was to be sought only in the south. The ground on which the claim was based were, roughly, that Spain would find it difficult to control the Wergha valley, and that for France pre-eminence in that region was necessary to enable her to secure her position at Fez. Round this question of the Wergha valley discussion has turned and turned for the last four months. Spain continues to protest that to cede the whole valley is to cut her only line of military communications between the Gharb and the Melilla district. France steadily maintains that the possession of the whole valley, or at the very least the territory of all the riverain tribes, is absolutely essential to her, and since the recent outbreak at Fez her insistence has been more emphatic than ever. Spain has gone so far as to consent to cede the left bank of the river for a distance subsequently to be determined, but protests her inability to give way further. So acute did the dispute wax that at one moment a rupture seemed probable, a danger then happily averted owing in large measure to the friendly offices of Great Britain. Unfortunately these friendly efforts have not yet been crowned with success, and at the moment of writing the danger of a rupture or perhaps another "lapse" of the negotiations, has not yet disappeared. Meanwhile the Franco-Spanish Commission is idle. The French members returned to Paris for Easter and there apparently they are to remain till the territorial dispute is settled. It is not a glorious record of 12 months' work when all is said and done; but if even thus little time is wasted, and agreement it will at least not have been labour wasted. Any other issue would be so deplorable, so little to the credit of either of the high contracting parties, that such a possibility cannot be seriously contemplated.

Persia.

News of the Week.

Sir Edward Grey in reply to questions from Mr. Walter Guinness and Mr. Noel Buxton in the House of Commons on the 25th June said that competent military authorities, both here and in India, have been consulted as to the desirability of a Russo-Indian Railway. It was, however, contrary to usage to publish confidential views on strategic questions. The conditions for which the Government would finally stipulate would certainly take into account those views. No definite project at present existed, said Sir Edward Grey. The Government, however, after consulting the Government of India, stated beforehand that any countenance they might give to such a railway must be subject to conditions acceptable to the Government. To decide always to oppose any Trans-Persian Railway would be neither practical nor a wise judgment.

A long letter from Sir Valentine Chirol is published in the Times, in which he discusses the Trans-Persian Railway. He strongly deprecates prejudicing the case against it, though he admits that the case in favour of it has yet to be made out. Railway communication between England and India cannot be indefinitely postponed. Is it not wiser, he asks, to deal with the question when we have the opportunity of exercising by friendly means a decisive influence upon the solution of the problem?

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Teheran, May 27.

THE great Yeprem, as he himself predicted but a short time back, died a soldier's death. He was shot during the last fight with the Salar-ed-Dowleh's forces at Shurijeh, whilst directing an operation which resulted in the abandonment by the enemy of a point of vantage. It has been said that he unnecessarily exposed himself to the enemy's fire at short range. Be this as it may, a commander of a force in action must be the best judge as to the need of his presence at any particular spot, and whether or not in this particular case the advantage gained was not too dearly purchased is not for us to say. All we can say is that he died fighting a successful action, and we cannot ask more of any soldier.

The action at Shurijeh appears to have been a severe one. It is impossible to obtain accurate information regarding the numbers engaged, but we gather that the Government force amounted to something in the neighbourhood of 1,000 men, as against about 1,500 on the side of their opponents. Similarly, in the matter of casualties, no reliable information is to be obtained. According to the official reports the enemy lost 300, and the Government five or six. After Yeprem's death the command was taken over by Gherie, the next best officer in the Armenian ranks. Once defeated the enemy was kept on the run. His dispersal is apparently complete, for the last news we have is that the Government force has arrived at Kangavar en route for Kermanshah, which town they expect to reach in about two days from now. In his last official despatch the commander states that he had received a report from Kermanshah to the effect that Salar-ed-Dowleh has been murdered in the house of his chief supporter, David Khan. Whether the report be true or not, it is not unreasonable to believe that the problem of the rebel Prince is one of the past. The re-occupation of Kermanshah by the Government troops will deprive this troublesome individual of the main source of his funds. Further, the bulk of his supporters has already left him. In these circumstances the only sensible course open to him is to leave the country.

The Cabinet is at the present moment undergoing another shuffle, and during the process the work of Government is suspended. The Kawam-es-Sultaneh, Minister of the Interior, has resigned, the result of his objections to the use of a secret telegraphic code by the Prime Minister in his communications with the Kawam-ul-Mulk in Shiraz. The Vusugh-ed Dowleh, Minister of Foreign Affairs, is also resigning out of sympathy, it is said, for the Kawam-es-Sultaneh, who is his brother. There will now be a general shift round, but it is quite impossible at present to predict with any accuracy who the new Ministers are to be.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST")

Lord Lamington, who returned to London on the 30th May, left England early in the year to study the situation in Persia. Reuter's Agency is informed that Lord Lamington has had a very interesting trip, but at the present moment he does not feel free to discuss the political situation in Persia further than to say that the country was in a very distressful condition. Events seemed to be changing very rapidly, but there was an entire absence of order.

Lord Lamington visited Bushire and Mohammerah, he travelled up the Karun river to Ohvaz, visited the oil fields, and passed through the Bakhtiari country to Teheran.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Reuter's St. Petersburg correspondent telegraphs:—A message from Tabriz announces that information has reached the Persian authorities from Ardebil, under date 4th June, that a Russian force under General Fidaroff marched out from the town during the night against the Shahsevens, and at dawn fighting began above Serabi. When the message was despatched an engagement was in progress at two points about 12 miles from Ardebil, and on the Russian side eight men had been killed.

Persia and the Trans-Persian Railway.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—The projected railway from Russia across Persia to India raises questions of a strategical and a political character with which it would be impossible adequately to deal in a brief letter. But there is another aspect of the scheme, so far as this country is concerned, upon which I should like to say something,—namely, the probable effect of the railway upon our commerce with Persia. And there are the all-important questions: how the railway will effect Persia and whence the revenues are to be derived to find the interest on the money required for its construction.

I must not trespass upon your space by attempting to do more than indicate the nature of these questions. Let me at the outset express the hope that those who take part in this discussion, whether in Parliament or in the Press, and who may be connected with the promotion of this or other railway projects in Persia, will let the fact be known. Personally, I am not concerned with the promotion of this railway. I have been sounded by one of the promoters, and the view which I expressed was that the principle which should govern the construction of railways in Persia was consideration for the needs and resources of Persia. I made it plain that, in my opinion, a prima facie case for a railway across Persia would have been made good if it could be proved that such a railway was best adapted to Persia's needs and that Persia possessed the necessary resources for its construction. I inquired whether it were possible to present such a prima facie case. As the railway could not be built without a guarantee of interest, and as the only revenues appropriate for such a purpose were, so far as I knew, the Customs duties which had been appropriated for the service of loans, I inquired to what other revenues recourse would be had. To this question I have not yet received any satisfactory answer; but it is rumoured that a guarantee by the British and Russian Governments may be forthcoming. If so, will the British guarantee be derived from Indian or from Imperial funds and will it require the sanction of Parliament? Has the Russian Government withdrawn from the decision, announced last year, that the scheme must not involve an obligation upon the Russian Treasury? We ought to have an answer to these questions as soon as possible.

As regards the features of the Trans-Persian scheme, your readers may find it useful to refer to two papers and discussions on the subject published by the Central Asian Society in their Proceedings for February and March of last year. I understand that the tracé of the railway in its present form contemplates junction with the Russian railways either at Julia on the Araxes or just south of Baku and with the Indian railways at Karachi. From the Russian frontier the line is to be taken through Teheran, Isfahan, Yazd, Kerman, Regan and Rampur to Charbar on the Indian Ocean, and thence along the coast to Karachi. This tracé brings the line fairly close to the borders of Sistan and British Baluchistan. From the commercial point of view it is obvious that such a railway by itself would satisfy the needs neither of Persia nor of Great Britain. Unless British trade is to be swept out of Northern and Central Persia, the trunk railway will have to be joined up with the Black Sea on the north, through Tabriz, and with the head of the Persian Gulf on the south. From the commercial point of view our approval of the scheme would seem to be impossible unless it provides for these two arms. They are no less essential to Persia than to ourselves. There is already a large trade between Northern Persia and the Black Sea, and between Central Persia, through Isfahan, and the Persian Gulf.

The immediate needs of Persia in the matter of railways would seem to be best met by a railway connecting her capital and most productive districts with the Russian frontier on the one side and head of the Persian Gulf on the other. This would not preclude an extension eastwards of the railway system as the resources of the country develop. It would greatly assist the Persian Government in the task which lies immediately before them of restoring order in the south. Proposals for a Persian State railway of this nature, with which I was myself in part associated, were laid before the Persian Government last year. They provided that the northern sections of the line should be financed by Russian and the southern by British capital. After protracted negotiations, with the course of which the Russian Government were kept acquainted, the contract for the southern section was completed and only required the sanction of the Persian Parliament. Now that this Parliament has been swept away, the more ambitious and much more costly scheme for a railway across Persia seems for the moment to be in the ascendant. But its promoters will have to answer the questions which have indicated above before we can regard it as a practical scheme, alike acceptable to Persia and in consonance with the commercial interests of our own country. On its probable political effects and its strategical aspects in relation to India I will say nothing.

Yours respectfully,

H. F. B. LYNCH.

Russian Advance in Persia.

RECENT events in Persia have demonstrated to the most optimistic mind that the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1907 did not close the Central Asian question for all time. In order to present the situation created by the Russian occupation of Northern and North-Eastern Persia in its proper perspective, it is necessary to examine with some care the literature of the Central Asian question. The first document is the scheme of policy alleged to have been drafted by Peter the Great as foreshadowing the destiny of Russia. Whoever was the author of this State paper, anyone who has studied Russian foreign policy cannot but be impressed by the closeness with which that scheme of policy has approximated to the realities of history. Section VI, for instance, runs thus —

"Keep up a state of anarchy in Poland, influence the national assemblies, and above all regulate the election of its kings, split it up on every occasion that presents itself, and finally subjugate it"

That proviso has been carried into effect to the last particular. The modern world has almost accepted the partition of Poland as a final, irredeemable act. So far as the present discussion is concerned, Articles VII and VIII are vital —

(VII) Enter into a close alliance with England and maintain direct relations with her by means of a good commercial treaty.

(VIII) Bear in mind that the commerce of India is the commerce of the world, and that he who can exclusively command it is dictator of Europe. No occasion, therefore, should be lost to provoke war with Persia, to hasten its decay, to advance on the Persian Gulf, and then to endeavour to re-establish the ancient trade of the Levant through Syria.

The process of the absorption of Persia by Russia has continued steadily, writes C. H. Norman in the first of a series of articles in the Outlook. In 1813 the treaty of Gulistan was concluded, by which Persia acknowledged "the sovereignty of the Empire of Russia over the provinces of Karabagh and Georgia, now called Elizabeth Paul, the districts of Shekie, Shirvan, Kobek, Derbend, Bakoubek, and such part of Talish as is now possessed by Russia, the whole of Degestan, Georgia, the tract of Shoorgil, etc., the whole country between the boundary at present established and the line of Caucasus and all the territory between the Caucasus and the Caspian Sea." Russia was quietly stirring up strife along the Russo-Persian frontier till 1828, when the treaty of Turkomanchai was entered into, by which Persia ceded "the Khanate of Erivan on either side of the Araxes and the Khanate of Nakhitchevan." Then for a period of several decades, peace reigned on the Russo-Persian frontier. Russian encroachments upon the Persian boundaries ceased, for Russia was consolidating her influence in the Khanates of Central Asia. In 1833 came Demaison's mission to Bokhara. In 1839 Perovski advanced on Khiva. In 1841 Russia seized Ashurade. In 1844 the Great Horde of the Kirghiz submitted to Russian suzerainty. In 1857 the Caucasus was formally annexed. In 1864 Turkestan acknowledged the temporal supremacy of the Tsar, while Khojend, in the same year, was taken by Russian forces.

Here one must refer to the circular despatch of Prince Gortchakoff, issued to the British Government on 21st November 1864. The Russian statesman, in analysing the motives of Russian policy, argued as follows:—

The position of Russia in Central Asia is that of all civilised States which are brought into contact with half-savage, nomad populations, possessing no fixed social organisation. In such case, it always happens that the more civilised State is forced, in the interest of the security of its frontier and its commercial relations, to exercise a certain ascendancy over those whom their turbulent and unsettled character makes most undesirable neighbours. First, there are raids and acts of pillage to be put down. To put a stop to them the tribes on the frontier have to be reduced to a state of more or less perfect submission. The result once attained, these tribes take to more peaceful habits, but are more in their turn exposed to the attacks of the more distant tribes. The State is bound to defend them against these depredations and to punish those who commit them. It is a peculiarity of Asiatics to respect nothing but visible and palpable force; the moral force of reason and of the interests of civilisation has as yet no hold upon them. The work has then always to be done over again from the beginning. In order to put a stop to this state of permanent disorder, fortified posts are established in the midst of these hostile tribes, and an influence is brought to bear upon them which reduces them by degrees to a state of more or less forced submission. But some beyond this second line, other still more distant tribes, come in their turn to threaten the same dangers and necessitate the same measures of repression. The State thus finds itself forced to choose one of two alternatives—either to give up this endless labour and to abandon its frontier to perpetual disturbances, or, on the other hand, to plunge deeper and deeper into barbarous countries where the difficulties and expenses increase with every advance. Such has been the fate of every country which has found itself in a similar position. The United States in America, France in Algeria, Holland in her colonies, England in India—all have been irresistibly forced, less by ambition than by imperious necessity, into this onward march, where the greatest difficulty is to know where to stop.

This brilliant State paper was a connecting link between the ancient world and modern Imperialism. Since the days of Caesar no one has more strongly enunciated the reasons why powerful communities, who are developing their resources, are compelled to extend their territories at the expense of weaker neighbours. These principles of policy were promptly acted on. In 1868 Samarkand was captured by General Kauffmann. In 1869 Stolietoff occupied Krasnovodsk. In 1871 Kizil Arvat was razed and Khiva surrendered. In 1873 Khokand was seized in 1875 and was annexed in 1876 under the name of Ferghana.

This incessant advance was attracting some attention in India and in England. It was pointed out that General Duhamel's scheme for the invasion of India, which had been submitted to the Tsar in 1855, had, as its strategical principle, advocated a march on India via Persia and Baluchistan. In 1868 Sir H. Rawlinson issued his famous Memorandum on the Central Asian question, in which he observed —

Anyone who traces the movements of Russia towards India on the map of Asia cannot fail to be struck with the resemblance which these movements bear to the operations of an army opening parallels against a beleaguered fortress. The third parallel would be drawn from Asterabad at the south east corner of the Caspian along the Persian frontier to Herat, and from thence through the Hazareh uplands to the Oxus, or possibly by Candahar to Cabul. Established upon such a line her position would indeed be formidable. Troops, stores, and material might be concentrated to any extent at Asterabad. The country between that port and Herat is open and admirably supplied. Herat has been often called "the key of India," and fully deserves its reputation as the most important military position in Central Asia. The earthworks which surround the town are of the most colossal character and might be indefinitely strengthened. Water and supplies abound. It is no exaggeration to say that if Russia were once established in full strength at Herat and her communications were secured in one direction with Asterabad through Meshed, in another with Khiva through Merv, and in a third with Tashkend and Bokhara through Mymeneh and the passage of the Oxus, all the native forces of Asia would be inadequate to expel her from the position.

In 1874 the Russian advance being still unchecked, Sir Henry Rawlinson prepared a paper entitled "Later Phases of the Central Asian Question." He answered the query "What is the particular evil or danger to be apprehended from the presence of the Russians at Merv?" by pointing out —

Russia by advancing on Merv evidently means mischief. She would never embark on an enterprise of so perilous a nature for mere purposes of trade or police. Political objects of high import could alone justify the movement. Those objects necessarily point to Herat, which would lie at the mercy of a European Power holding Merv, and from whence India would be seriously threatened. Russia in possession of Herat would have a grip on the throat of India. Herat is both strategically and politically an indispensable bulwark of India, and we cannot and will not allow its future fate to be at the disposition of a foreign Power.

Colonel MacGregor, who had journeyed through Khōrassan in 1875, thus emphasised the value of Herat —

Herat has been termed the key of India, not lightly as a mere figure of speech, but by every officer who has had an opportunity of seeing its valley. It is so because it is the nearest and best point at which an invader could concentrate and prepare for the invasion of that country, advantages which it gains from its beautiful valley, the fertility of which is unrivalled in Asia, from its strategical position which gives it the command of all the important roads to India; from the great strength of its fortress, it being in fact the strongest place from the Caspian to the Indus, from its admirable climate and from the prestige it enjoys throughout Asia.

Notwithstanding these warnings the British Foreign Office remained quiescent and Russia proceeded calmly onwards. In 1877 Kars and Erzeroum were captured. In 1878 Grodekoff reached Herat. In 1879 the Russians advanced against the Tekke Turkomans, but were beaten back. In that same year the British Government became a little uneasy and requested explanations from Petersburg. Count Schouvaloff told Lord Salisbury that.

"The Russian Government had no intention of sending an expedition from the Caspian with the object of occupying Merv.

The expedition would be against the Tekkes only. He disbelieved in the existence of any desire to advance to Merv among Russian statesmen, and that even if it had been true that Russia had the intention of occupying Herat as a stepping-stone to India, Merv did not lie upon the nearest road between the Caspian and Herat."

In November, 1879, Mr. Gladstone gave utterance to these comforting sentiments:—

I do not believe the Emperor of Russia is a man of aggressive scheme of policy. I have no fear myself of the territorial extensions of Russia in Asia—no fear of them whatever. I think such fears are only old women's fears.

With this encouragement Russia began the Transcaspian Railway and seized Ilahmi. In 1881 Geok Tepé fell and the Turkomans were annihilated. In the same year Askabad was taken and the Tekkes were subdued, the Transcaspian Railway reached Kizil Arvat and Mr. O'Donovan arrived at Merv. In February, 1882, M. de Giern, in answer to further inquiries, stated to Sir Edward Thornton: "Russia has no intention whatever of occupying Merv and Sarakhs." That was the solemn undertaking of the Russian Secretary of State to the British Ambassador.

Persian Women.

MR. A. W. MORGAN SHUSTER, lately Treasurer-General of Persia, has an interesting article on "Persian Women in the Recent Crisis" in the May number of the Century Magazine. Mr. Shuster writes—

We live to-day in an era of change and great surprise. We discover every moment new laws of human existence, or novel applications of old ones to modern conditions. For example, if such things could be expressed in mathematical formula, we might assert that the capacity of a people to observe without nervous shock radical and even epoch-making reforms increases as the square of past experiences, or that the momentum acquired by a people in the pursuit of some long desired condition is in direct proportion to the past restraints under which they have fretted.

During the last five years, the women of Persia have become almost at a bound the most progressive, not to say radical, in the world. The fact makes one gape with astonishment, and upsets the previous notions of centuries.

Without the powerful moral influence of the Persian women,—those so-called chattels of the Oriental lords of creation,—the short lived, but marvellously conducted, revolutionary movement in Persia which has recently been smothered by Russia and England would have paled early into a mere disorganized protest. It was they, from their cloistered lives, who, with the patriotic support of the Islamic priests, fomented the national movement of the Persian people for the adoption of constitutional forms of government, and for the inculcation of Western political, commercial, and ethical codes.

Throughout the five years following on the successful, but bloodless, rising of the Persians in 1906 against the unendurable oppressions, cruelty, and extortions of their Shahs, a feverish and at times fierce light of patriotism has gleamed in the veiled eyes of Persian womanhood. In their thirst for liberty and its modern expressions, they have broken down many of the most sacred customs which from the beginning of history have bound their sex.

During my recent brief sojourn in the land of Iran my astonishment increased daily at the manifestations of the influence and high purposes of the Mahomedian women. We have long been accustomed to the increasingly large rôle played by Western women in business, in the professions, in literature, in science, and in politics; but what shall we say of the veiled woman of the near East who overnight become teacher, newspaper writers, founders of woman's clubs, and speakers on political subjects? What shall we think when we find them vigorously propagating the most progressive ideas of the Occident in a land until recently wrapped in the hush and gloom of centuries of despotism.

It is interesting to consider whence comes their desire to play a part in the political and social regeneration of their country, and their unwavering faith in the political and social institutions of the West. That the desire came, and still exists, there can be no possible doubt, and with it was born the discriminating intelligence which as a rule is acquired only by long years of practical experience. The Persian women have given to the world a notable example of the ability of inexperienced minds to assimilate rapidly an absolutely new idea, and with elan of the crusader who has a vision, they have set to work to accomplish their ideals.

The American finance administrators who went to Persia in May, 1911, to reorganize the fiscal system of that country were fortunate enough to win the confidence of the National Assembly, or Mejlis, a body which fairly represented the hopes and aspirations of the great mass of the Persian people. This point gained, we were soon made aware that another great, though secret, influence was watching our work with jealous but kindly eyes. It is well known in Teheran that there are dozens of more or less secret societies among the Persian women, with a central organization by which they are controlled. To this day I know neither the names nor the faces of the leaders of this group, but in a hundred different ways we learned that we were to be befriended and supported by the patriotic fervour of thousands of the weaker sex.

A few examples may suffice. I was sitting in my office one morning last summer, several months after our arrival in Teheran, when I was told that one of the Persian clerks in the Treasury Department wished to see me on an important matter. Information comes unexpectedly and from such curious sources in the Orient that no offer can safely be rejected. A young man came in whom I had never before seen. We spoke in French, and after receiving permission to talk freely, with many apologies he said that his mother was our friend, that she had commissioned him to say that Mrs. Shuster should not pay a visit to the household of a certain Persian grandee, by whose family she had been invited since he was an enemy to the constitutional government and my wife's visit would make the Persians suspect me. I thanked him, though at the time I did not myself know of the contemplated visit, but I soon learned that it was true, and of course advised against it. I called the young Persian again and asked him how his mother knew of this purely private social affair. He said that it had been known and discussed in the secret society to which his mother belonged, and that it was decided to warn me against it.

On another occasion last fall a large crowd of poor women came to the Atabak Park, where I lived and had my private offices, to make a demonstration because the Treasury had been unable to pay the Government pension, on which over a million dollars was then due. The available funds had been necessary for the volunteer troops who had been fighting against the ex-Shah, Muhamad Ali Mirza, who was attempting to regain the throne. I sent one of my Persian secretaries to ask these women who had told them to come and make this demonstration. He reported that it had been instigated by a reactionary grandee who was well known to be favouring the cause of the ex-Shah. I had them told that they would be given an answer on the following day if they dispersed quietly, which they did.

I then sent to one of the women's societies a simple explanation of our financial straits and the impossibility of paying these pensions because of the needs of the constitutional government, with a request that the Society prevent any further agitation against the Treasury. Though it did not become possible to pay these pensions, there was never another demonstration by women on this account.

They have a saying in Teheran that when the women take part in a chuluk (strike or riot) against a Cabinet or the Government, the situation has become serious.

On 9th and 10th October the confiscation of the properties of the two rebellious brothers of the ex-Shah, took place, despite the illegal and outrageous intervention of the Russian Consul-General at Teheran, who with Russian Cossacks made the Treasury officials prisoners on the first day. Finding that their Consul-General had no excuse in law or fact for his conduct to wards Persia, the Russian Cabinet concocted and gave out the pretext that one of these properties was mortgaged to the Russian bank at Teheran, and that its former owner, the Prince Shua-u-Saltaneh, brother of the ex-Shah, owed the bank some $225,000. Everyone knew that the claim was both false and absurd, but as there is no recognised system for recording mortgages, and as the rebel Prince himself would doubtless swear to the transaction in order to save his property from confiscation, we were at a loss how to disprove this claim.

To all demands that the Russian bank should produce us books and other proofs of the debt a deaf ear was turned.

It was then that I received a striking proof of the courage and patriotism of Persian womanhood, and of the practical value of their moral support. One of my principal Persian assistants, a very highly educated and patriotic man, came to me and said that his sister was one of the wives of Prince Shu-u-Saltaneh, and that she had obtained one of the copies of the Prince's last will and testament, executed within the year, just before he had left Persia, and in compliance with all the ceremony and formality required by law and the Mahomedan religion for a man of that rank. She had informed him that this document, as was required, contained full lists and inventories of all the Prince's lands and property, and a statement of all debts due to him or by him—in fact, a complete and solemn report of his financial situation. The sister of my informant had told him to bring me this document, though at enormous risk to the lives and property rights of herself and her children, because she believed it was her duty to her country. I received the document, and with it was able to refute absolutely the last falsehood on which the Russian Government had depended to justify the hostile and unlawful acts of her consular officials in this affair.

We come now to the occasion on which the Persian women, in their zeal for liberty and their ardent love for their nationality, threw down the last barriers which distinguished their sex, and gave evidence of a courage and heroism worthy to be sung in imperishable verse.

The Russian Government, on 19th November 1911, had delivered a second forty-eight-hour ultimatum to Persia, demanding my expulsion from the post of Treasurer-General, the full control in future of all foreign administrators or advisers, the payment of a heavy indemnity to Russia, and a promise to decide all past, present, and future questions between Persia and Russia to the satisfaction of the Russian Government. The acceptance of the terms of this ultimatum meant the complete abdication by Persia of her sovereignty. A few minutes before the time expired, on 1st December the National Assembly, in public session, gave its unanimous vote to reject the conditions.

The Cabinet was panic-stricken, and a gloomy foreboding was in the air. There were neither men nor means with which to oppose successful resistance to the thousands of troops and the batteries of artillery which Russia was already pouring into Northern Persia. The days passed, and another effort was made by the now thoroughly frightened Cabinet to get the National Assembly to vote them powers to accept the Russian and British demands. The deputies again solemnly refused. As one of the religious representatives phrased it in the chamber, "It may be the will of Allah that our liberty and our sovereignty shall be taken from us by force, but let us not sign them away with our own hands." The people in Teheran and throughout the provinces heard of the Assembly's brave stand and were delirious with joy.

Then came the dark days when doubts were whispered as to whether the Assembly would stand firm; sickening fears arose as to the effects of the threats and bribes which were being freely used on the deputies by Russian emissaries and protéges. It was rumoured more than once that in secret conclave the Assembly had decided to yield. The bazaars and people of the capital city were torn with anxiety. What could they do to hold their representatives to their duty?

Comes forward now the Persian woman! Out from their walled courtyards and harems marched three hundred of that weak sex, with the flush of undying determination in their cheeks. They were clad in their plain black robes, with the white net of their veils dropped over their faces. Many held pistols under their skirts or in the folds of their sleeves. Straight to the Assembly they went, and, gathered there, demanded of the president that he admit them all. What the grave deputies of the land of the Lion and the Sun may have thought at this strange visitation, history saith not. The president consented to receive a delegation of them. In his reception hall they confronted him, and lest he and his colleagues should doubt their meaning, these cloistered Persian mothers, wives, and daughters showed their revolvers threateningly, tore aside their veils, and confessed their decision to kill their own husbands and sons and add their own dead bodies to the sacrifice if the deputies should waver in their duty to uphold the liberty and dignity of the Persian people and nation.

A week or two later, the Assembly was destroyed by a coup d'état executed by Russian hirelings, but its members were stainless of having sold their country's birthright.

All honor to the veiled women of Persia! With the constraining traditions of the past about them, with the idea of absolute dependence upon the fancy and caprice of men ever before them, deprived of all opportunity to educate themselves after modern ideals, watched, guarded, and rebuffed, they offered up their daily contribution to their country's cause, watching its servants each moment with a mother's jealous eyes, and failed not, even in that grim, ragged hour when men's hearts grew weak and the palsying dread of the prison and its tortures, the noose and the bullet, had settled heavy on the bravest in the land.

The dearest hopes of the Persian people have been cruelly smothered, but the memory of their heroic women will live to inspire mankind wherever the love of justice dwells in the hearts of men.

Lord Kitchener's Report on Egypt.

(FROM THE "TIMES")

LORD KITCHENER'S first report as His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General dealing with the finances, administration, and condition of Egypt and the Sudan in 1911 was issued last night by the Foreign Office as a White paper [Cd. 6149]. In the introduction to his report Lord Kitchener, after paying a tribute to the memory of his predecessor, Sir Eldon Gorst, says that it gave him great personal pleasure to return to Egypt, and after an absence of 11 years he was in a position to realize, better perhaps than those who had been continuously working in the country, the progress and changes which had taken place. Alluding to the effects of the Turco-Italian war, he says:—

"Almost simultaneously with my arrival in Egypt the whole political situation in the Near East was radically disturbed by the totally unexpected action of Italy in declaring war against the Turkish Empire and proceeding to invade Tripoli and Cyrenaica. It was not surprising, in view of the geographical proximity to Egypt of these two districts, the close relationship existing between the people of Benghazi and the Egyptian Arabs, and the bonds of common religion and ties of trade and commerce that an extremely warm feeling of sympathy should have been aroused in the country for the Muhammadan combatants. The excitement caused by the war was widespread and deep, but notwithstanding the mischievous efforts of some of the more irresponsible native newspapers, the people of Egypt have displayed the most praiseworthy self-restraint, and have devoted themselves to quite justifiable and generous efforts to relieve the distress and the suffering caused by the war and to the equipment and despatch of Red Crescent hospitals to succour the wounded. Egypt was declared neutral, and that neutrality has been strictly maintained by Egyptians, who have thus shown an admirable devotion to duty, law, and order, in spite of the intensely sympathetic and religious feelings roused by the long struggle which has been going on so close to their frontier.

"I am glad to be able to report that political feeling in other respects has lately been much calmer, and that the consideration of practical reforms for the good of the country has apparently become more interesting to the majority of the people than discussions on abstruse political questions which are unlikely to lead to any useful result."

Continuing Lord Kitchener states that the future development of the people of Egypt depends on improved conditions of agriculture and educational progress. In this respect the newly-formed Agricultural Department is doing its best to impart instruction to cultivators and to overcome the conservative methods of the fellah. Efforts are also being made to improve the cotton seed used by the poorer classes and much-needed drainage works are to be carried out as soon as possible. The expenses incurred by the raising of the Assuan Dam, which is to be finished next May, will be covered many times over by the benefits accruing from the increased irrigation of the country. In speaking of education the report states:—

"In 1910 an important and very interesting experiment was commenced, viz., the handing over of local education to the then recently constituted Provincial Councils, funds being provided by a percentage on the land taxes. The Ministry of Education has been careful not to interfere with the manner in which the various educational schemes prepared by the Provincial Councils have been carried out, although it has been always ready to give advice and assistance when asked to do so. The Councils took up the work with enthusiasm, and undoubtedly, under their supervision and control, a great impulse has been given to education. This new departure has introduced a much-needed elasticity and diversity into the system of instruction and has enlarged the field of free education. Time and scope must be given to enable their efforts to develop and crystallize, and it is premature at present to give any definite opinion on the result while the experiment is still in a somewhat indeterminate and provisional stage.

After referring to the improvements required in the system of elementary education which has hitherto prevailed, the report proceeds:—

"What seems most required for progress in the direction is to evolve the best type of rural school, adapted to the special practical needs of agricultural districts, and when this has been done we may confidently hope to see a considerable increase in the number of boys educated. It must not be forgotten that any hasty or unthought-out development of education in rural districts, unless it is carefully adapted to rural necessities, may imperil the agricultural interest on which the prosperity of the country so largely depends. A rural exodus in Egypt would be an economic and social disaster of considerable magnitude. To avoid this contingency, a half-time system of education allowing of labour in the field for the remainder of the day, with holidays fixed in accordance with agricultural necessities, seems the best solution."

Lord Kitchener concludes his introduction to the report on Egypt by referring to the Legislative Council, the Capitulations, and the Mixed Tribunals:—

"The Legislative Council has been working well, and I think its members are fully imbued with an earnest desire to improve the condition of the people. How far, however, owing to the manner of their election and their numbers in the Council, they represent effectively the well-considered wishes of the inhabitants of all classes appears to me to be open to question and to require careful study.

"My predecessors have so often and so fully pointed out the clog to the progress of Egypt caused by the Capitulations, that it is almost unnecessary for me to refer to this hindrance to the advance of the country imposed by foreign Powers. It is hoped that some alleviation of the tutelage in which the country is still held may be the outcome of a protest made by Egypt at the last International Sanitary Congress, which was well received by the experts assembled in Paris.

"The condition of the Mixed Tribunals has attracted considerable attention of late. These Courts, as has been frequently pointed out, constitute an imperium in imperio, and I apprehend that inherent defects in the fundamental principles of their organization are the main causes of recent developments in the institution which have given rise to so much comment.

"There can, indeed, be little doubt that these Courts are no longer adequate to deal satisfactorily with the large volume of civil and commercial business which comes before them, and I hear constant complaints on this head from the commercial community. This is scarcely surprising, in view of the steady increase of arrears during the last few years, both in the Cairo Tribunal and the Court of Appeal. The remedy usually suggested for the present unsatisfactory state of affairs is very simple and merely consists in an increase in the staff of judges. I am not, however, myself convinced that such an increase in the existing number of judges as the Egyptian Government could reasonably be asked to make would prove an adequate corrective of the defects so much complained of. The real remedy is to be sought in the adoption of certain essential modifications in the existing organization of these Courts, such as an increase in the number of benches by means of a reduction in the number of judges required to form a chamber. Unfortunately the difficulty of obtaining the necessary agreement of all the Powers to certain measures of reform proposed by the Government has hitherto proved insurmountable. I greatly fear, therefore, that in spite of the efforts of the many capable judges who compose these Courts, little substantial improvement in their general efficiency and output can be looked for under existing circumstances.

"As regards the Native Tribunals, considerable progress has been made since I was last in Egypt. The number of summary Courts has been substantially increased, and the institution of Merkaz Tribunals has brought justice very much nearer to the doors of the people, though in this respect I consider a further extension might be made. The work is undoubtedly heavy, but the arrears are nowhere large, and justice is in general administered by the native judges with efficiency and despatch. Indeed, it frequently happens that foreigners assign their claims to natives in order to get them dealt with rapidly in the Native Courts. Though I am glad thus to be able to record a great advance in the morale and capacity of the native judiciary, there should be no relaxation in the efforts of all concerned to inspire among the whole community implicit confidence in the administration of justice by the native magistrates.

In dealing with the financial situation of Egypt the report reproduces at some length some remarks of Sir Paul Harvey, the Financial Adviser to the Khedive, included in his Note on the Budget of 1912, the substance of which was furnished to us by our Cairo correspondent and published in the Times of January 8th. Lord Kitchener states that he entirely concurs with the Financial Adviser's statement of the satisfactory features of the situation, which, he adds, "are in great measure due to the prudent economies realized in past years, and which reflect the greatest credit on the wise and careful administration of the resources of the country by Sir Paul Harvey."

The accounts for 1911 were published in March and a brief summary of their results appeared in the Times of March 12th. The total revenue for the year was £16,793,000, and the expenditure £14,872,000, leaving a surplus of £1,921,000. The revenue exceeded that for 1910 by £827,000 and was greater by £445,000 than that for 1907, in which year the highest revenue previously recorded was collected. A saving of £128,000 was effected in the actual as compared with the estimated expenditure.

After various sections dealing with the Departments of Agriculture, Public Works, Education, Interior, Public Health and Justice, the report, so far as Egypt is concerned, concludes with a short review of the military situation:—

"In all the operations carried out during the year the Army has borne itself with credit and shown that it is thoroughly efficient in every respect.

"In Egypt the military situation remains unchanged.

"The distribution of the available troops in the Sudan is determined by the desire to concentrate in suitable stations, whence striking forces can be speedily despatched to any threatened locality, and at the same time to guard the extensive frontiers from any hostile raids of invasion.

"Operations are in progress against the Beir tribe, who had been engaged in continual raids on the Dinkas.

"With a view to checking the arms traffic, it has been decided to occupy the country from Sobat to Uganda along the Abyssinian frontier.

"A beginning has been made with the formation of a locally enlisted force in Mongalla for service in that province, and it is hoped to extend this system to Behr-el-Ghazal."

In his introduction to the section of the report devoted to the Sudan Lord Kitchener calls attention to the visit of the King and Queen in January and the effect which it has exerted on the tribes:—

"It is impossible to over-estimate the excellent effect which this visit has produced throughout the country. It has succeeded in bringing home to the people the great interest which His Majesty the King takes in their welfare, while many of them have had the satisfaction of seeing His Majesty in person. After the departure of Their Majesties the Sheikhs and notables assembled at Khartoum to discuss the affairs of the Sudan with Government officials, and it was very evident from their conversation how greatly they had been impressed by all they had seen and heard."

Lord Kitchener goes on to state that the experiments in cotton growing in the Sudan have been completely successful. The opening up of this new field of enterprise leads to the consideration of population. Before the Dervish conquest the number of inhabitants amounted to about nine millions. The rule of the Mahdi and his successor reduced this, however, to two millions. Under British rule the numbers have already increased to three millions which, it is expected, will be doubled in the next five years. The prosperity of the inhabitants has increased by leaps and bounds, and to-day it may be said that there is hardly a poor man in the Sudan. A surplus of £145,000 is anticipated on the ordinary revenue.

Lord Kitchener then proceeds to deal comprehensively with all the various branches of internal administration, and an interesting statement on frontier affairs is added. In speaking of the Abyssinian frontier the report says:—

"The eastern frontier districts have been comparatively undisturbed. As a result of representations by His Majesty's Minister at Adis Ababa, the Abyssinian Government have taken action which should prevent the recurrence of the raids which have been prevalent in past years.

"On the southern frontier the position is less satisfactory. During the year there were four armed raids on a large scale by the Anuaks, and the Sudan Government are now organizing a force to be despatched to the disturbed region in order to restore tranquillity. If there is to be any hope of putting an end to the Anuak raids, the Abyssinian Government will have to co-operate with the Sudan authorities in procuring either a general disarmament of the Anuak tribe or in introducing some measure for the repression of the arms traffic in Abyssinia, which is directly responsible for the present disturbances."

After mentioning that most cordial relations exist between the officials of the Sudan Government and those of the Belgian Congo, Eritrea, and the French Congo, the report proceeds to deal in the following terms with the question of arms traffic:—

"The Sudan Government have shown great activity in dealing with the question of arms traffic. The aim of the Government is to confine the possession of a rifle, with a strictly limited supply of ammunition, to a few of the most loyal and influential chiefs, and to disarm the remainder of the natives. North of latitude 13deg this policy has been partially realized. South of this latitude, although much progress has been made, complete disarmament must await the development of administrative control. An important factor in suppressing the trade has been the order, promulgated in July, adding sulphur to the list of articles whose import into the Sudan is prohibited. The desert barrier of the Northern Sudan, the rigid precautions taken at the Nile and Red Sea ports, and the presence of the French and Belgians on the western and southern frontiers, as of the British in Uganda and East Africa, are factors which should enable the Sudan authorities to deal thoroughly with this traffic, which is the chief obstacle to the extension of civilization and tranquillity. On the eastern frontier alone a situation exists which gives cause for serious apprehension. Constant patrolling of the frontier, however, has done much to regulate the evil, though the inability of the Abyssinian Government to exercise any control, especially in the Anuak region, has had a most disastrous effect. In this district the Anuak armed raids have resulted in desperate efforts being made by their Nuer victims to obtain rifles at any cost, and smuggling is rife. The Sudan Government are endeavouring to deal with this situation by arresting the Galla parties who are trading rifles for ivory with the Nuers, and by diverting into authorized channels the extensive ivory trade which is the direct cause of the Anuak raids.

"It is, however, evident that nothing short of the establishment of a strong and capable administration of the Anuak country and Galla districts near the frontier can be of much effect in putting an end to the present state of affairs."

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—The Minister of the Interior projects the establishment of a corps of inspectors to control officials in the vilayets of the Empire beginning with Macedonia. They will rank after the valis. He proposes to engage Englishmen.

Reuter wires from Rome.—The Chamber of Deputies has agreed to establish a Ministry for the Colonies.

Reuter wires from Tripoli.—While a waggon-load of shells was being unloaded here yesterday, one shell exploded killing one officer and seven bluejackets, while three bluejackets were injured.

A serious mutiny has broken out among the troops in Macedonia, some two hundred Albanians at Monastir, Ohrida, and Perlepe deserting with arms and joining the Albanian insurgents south of Ipek. It is believed that the mutiny is a revolt against the Young Turk régime and that a number of ex-Deputies are involved.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

REUTER'S Constantinople correspondent telegraphs.—According to a semi-official statement issued here, the Italians have executed two inhabitants of Derna, one for having returned to the town without permission, and the other for having refused to be enrolled in the native legion and for having torn his Italian uniform, which he was forced to wear. The native stoutly refused to enlist, preferring to die rather than fight his co-religionists.

Reuter's Constantinople correspondent says a telegram from Smyrna of Friday's date reports that the Italians have bombarded Plaka, near Scalanova, to the south of Smyrna.

A Smyrna message says the bombardment at Scalanova by Italians is confirmed. Two vessels fired ninety shells and then withdrew. Another account says the town itself was not bombarded, but the fire was directed at the military camp outside. All is quiet at Smyrna, but anxiety prevails.

The following semi-official statement has been issued, says Reuter's Athens correspondent.—On the occasion of the Italian National Festival, a committee from the Aegean Islands, now at Alexandria, sent a telegraphic appeal to King Victor Emmanuel, Signor Giolitti, the Italian Premier, and the Presidents of the Italian Senate and Chamber of Deputies, in which expression was given to the hope of the islanders that Italy, the liberator, would complete the work already begun by giving the captured islands the same autonomy as that enjoyed by Samos, or by uniting them with that island.

Telegrams were also despatched by the committee to Mr. Asquith and Lord Kitchener at Malta calling attention to the arbitrary privileges which the Turks have always arrogated to themselves and to the dangers of a return to the old régime. The committee in this message likewise demand a grant of autonomy guaranteed by the Powers, like the system in force in Samos, or in the alternative the union of the islands with the Principality.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" CORRESPONDENT.)

I learn from an official quarter that a despatch of the greatest importance has reached the Foreign Office from the British Embassy in Constantinople in connection with the efforts being made at mediation between Turkey and Italy by the Powers. The despatch for the first time sets out concisely and completely the terms upon which the Ottoman Government would consent to a cessation of hostilities, and as it exhibits a more reasonable attitude than has previously been the case, it is believed that it must necessarily strengthen the hands of Sir Edward Grey in his present efforts to bring about peace.

(FROM A "MORNING POST" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Alexis, May 24.

This morning early a large force of Italians came out eastwards of Bukemesch with the object of taking Sidi Said. After a fight lasting five hours they were again beaten back to their old position.

On the 20th the Italians also made a sortie from Bukemesch with five regiments of newly-arrived troops, having with them two guns and two mitrailleuses. They were beaten back and pursued right into the peninsula. The Turks entered Kaar (?) taking a great quantity of ammunition and some rifles. The quantity of bullets found strewn over the battlefield show that the Italian loss was very considerable. The Turks lost nine killed and 18 wounded.

Constantinople, May 27.

According to a report received at the Ministry of War, the fortifications of Barka, west of Benghazi, have been captured by Turkish forces, who hope to secure the town.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, June 5

The Government has summoned all Italian day labourers, piece labourers, skilled workmen, and foremen contractors in Turkey, whom the Turkish Government had exempted from the expulsion order, to return to Italy. The summons is made through the German Embassy at Constantinople, which is charged with the protection of Italian citizens in Turkey during the war.

Italians are informed that measures have been taken to provide them with work in Italy. It is not doubted that the summons will be obeyed. This exodus will, it is expected, seriously cripple Turkish industries.

The step is regarded as most significant. Evidently Italy contemplates further aggressive action against Turkey in the near future, and it is desired to remove Italians from any danger of attack by exasperated Turks at home.

A Reuter message from Constantinople gives the following detailed list of the classes which were not affected by the Turkish measure of expulsion.

1. Foremen and labourers employed in the building of railways.
2. All workmen using their hands, such as masons, painters, carpenters, lock-smiths, etc., and also all labourers paid daily. Musicians are, however, excepted even if they are in receipt of daily pay.
3. Aged people
4. Single women dependent on themselves
5. Persons entrusted with the care of the sick or aged.
6. Hospital doctors and surgeons.
7. Widows
8. Monks and nuns.

The Italian employees of the Public Debt Administration, says the Constantinople message, have been granted leave, and are receiving travelling expenses and an indemnity.

(FROM THE "PIONEER'S" CAIRO CORRESPONDENT.)

Talking of the Italo-Turkish war reminds me that this past week the Egyptian Gazette received from its correspondent in the Turkish camp a long account on the trend of the campaign. From what he writes it would appear that the Italian reports of victorious actions are far from true and that the headway they have made against the Turks and Arabs is more of the nature of General Kurapatkin's famous "advance northwards" than anything else. The most advanced point of the Italian defences at Derna are but one kilometre distant from the sea, and their efforts to protect themselves from the attacks of the Arabs have proved unavailing, for night after night the latter have managed to get into their lines and inflict great injury on them.

By far the most interesting part of this despatch is in the reference to the now famous engagement of the 3rd March. The lie direct is given to the Italian version published by the Nova Presse. The correspondent writes:—"According to him (the Vienna reporter) the Italians fought from morning to night with the greatest determination, several times charging the enemy with fixed bayonets, and chasing him from position to position. Now as a matter of fact up till about noon only our outposts were engaged. . . . the attack begun by the outposts was later developed and a general attack on that flank was ordered. . . . We saw whole battalions rushing up en masse to the support of the enemy's firing line which was being mostly effectively kept in check by a handful of Arabs. No advance in the true sense of the word was made throughout the day; they certainly threw out an additional flank firing line and of course its supporting and reserve lines, but they were the only troops who may have been said to have advanced in any direction and then only to lie down and do nothing at the first opportunity on reaching danger zone. . . . As for the bayonets, I don't think I saw even the gleam of one the whole day, and no Italian did anything with one, I am quite certain. In mid-afternoon they were so hard pressed that a movement rearwards was noticeable, but again receiving reinforcements they stood their ground for a little time urged on the whole while by their officers.

"Towards nightfall or about 5 P.M. the most amazing retreat I have ever imagined could be perpetrated by trained European troops started. The post they had been occupying and which had been the bone of contention all day is about 1,000 metres from their big fortress. Along this route which appeared to us as a horizon we could see the Italian troops running in companies, in files, in fours, en masse and en bloc in the utmost disorder towards this nightly shelter. Had we had more troops at our command at the time that disgraceful retreat would have been converted into such a bloody defeat and utter disaster for the Italians that I doubt if 1,000 men of the division in action would have returned to their walls. The Italian report admits 150 casualties, and adds that the following day hundreds of bodies were found. Bodies, yes; but they do not say that they were Italian bodies nor do they admit the loss of some 100 rifles thrown away and which were that night brought back into camp. The bodies of seven officers were also found by us, but Italian officers. The Italian account also states that hundreds of the enemy were killed. The facts are 31 killed, 55 wounded."

According to this correspondent during the past few months the Italians have little by little been vacating the advanced posts held by them, the position which was the scene of the fight on 3rd March and which they had been in the habit of holding in the day time, was definitely abandoned by them at the end of the same month, and since then they have not ventured out of their lines. The Arabs, whilst they admire the Italian officers for their pluck, have the greatest contempt for the soldiers, who appear to be completely demoralised. This despatch is of interest since it gives the version of the trend of the war from the other side. Up to now we have had very one-sided accounts of the fighting, and it has all along certainly looked as if the actual position did not bear out the Italian version of success.

Situation in Albania.

THE following are the decisions taken by the Ottoman Government in execution of the measures adopted towards the Malissors. —

1. A general amnesty has been extended to all those who took part in the disorders and have since submitted. There has been no prosecution of any Malissor of this category.

2. It has been decided that the Malissor conscripts would do their military service in the Constantinople circumscription or in the vilayet of Scutari. There has been no necessity for carrying this decision into effect, as all the vilayet of Scutari has been exempted from military service this year.

3. The present Kaimakam of Touz speaks Albanian, and henceforward officials knowing that language will be chosen for the post of Kaimakam. The Mudirs of the communes will be chosen from among the Albanian Bairaktars and their salaries will be paid by the Government. To prevent strife the Sub-Governor had requested the Bairaktars to choose from their own numbers those who ought to be appointed Mudirs in the different nahiehs, but as they could not agree upon their choice he has had to choose himself those who were most qualified for the positions of Mudirs. Thus three Mudirs have already been appointed to the Caza of Touz and nomination of the others will take place in the same way. Since the members of the Administrative Councils are elected by the population, the latter are free to choose those they think best qualified for the above posts.

4. Considering the precarious situation caused by the disorders, the Malissors will be exempt from taxation for two years. The taxes will then be assessed according to the economical condition of the population.

5. A Bill will be introduced in Parliament for the levying of one piastre only per head of sheep from the Malissors, to take effect from next year, as a sheep tax (Aghnam).

6. Leave is granted to the Malissor shepherds to carry arms, except in the towns and marketplaces. As almost all the Malissors are shepherds, this measure practically extends to the entire Malissor population.

7. The opening of primary schools at Chale, Chouch, Kastrati, Groda, Hoti and Clementi has been decided, where the language taught will be Albanian and the masters employed will be paid by the Government. Insuperable difficulties have, however, been encountered in the selection of masters. It was then decided to open in Scutari itself a boarding school for the young Malissors, but the Bairaktars refused to send their sons to that institution. It was then thought of opening one class-room, where the priests would teach; but the Malissors refused this solution as well. It was then decided to open two primary boarding schools—one at Touz and another at Zabor—so that the pupils will not have to go a great distance from home. The erection of three primary day schools has begun in three communes, and the Scutari boarding school, moreover, will serve as a public school for the young Malissors. Credits have already been allowed for all the schools.

8. The Government will construct roads and ways in all the communes inhabited by the Malissors.

9. Immediate orders have been given for the construction of these roads as soon as the Malissors return. Those already commenced are nearing completion. A thousand Turkish pounds have been allowed for the building of the causeway at Touz, where Malissor workmen will be employed.

10. A commission, having at its head an official from the vilayet of Scutari and a representative of the bishop, will be formed in each commune to fix the assistance to be extended to everyone who has suffered from the disorders, and those whose houses have been burnt down.

11. His Imperial Majesty the Sultan has granted 10,000 Turkish pounds assistance to the Malissors and the Government will add the necessary sum towards their relief.

12. Every Malissor returning to his home will receive a certain quantity of maize seeds and certain help in money proportionate to his needs.

The following sums have been allowed up to March 26th by the Imperial Government as regards the expenses mentioned in paragraphs 10, 11 and 12. —

	Piastres.	Para.
For those houses which have been burnt down ..	4,802,284	... 14
Maize and other food reliefs ..	1,787,109	... 06
One pound relief per individual ..	763,754	... 16
Rewards to the Chiefs ..	12,414	... 24
Weighing, costs of carriage by land and sea, warehousing, porters and other similar expenses	69,776	... 32
Indemnities paid for losses experienced by that part of population which did not join the insurrection and for damages caused to the churches and to the priests' belongings ..	326,574	... 31
Officials' travelling and other expenses ..	60,305	... 31
Total ..	7,822,217	... 34
Price of maize to be distributed until the end of June ..	700,000
Grand total ..	8,522,217	... 34

The following are fresh decisions on the part of the Inquiry Commission presided by Hadji Adil Bey, and of which Mr. Graves is a member as regards the further demands of the Malissors: —

1. Upon the presentation of a list by the archbishop a sum of 4,200 Turkish pounds had been allowed for the damage caused to the religious objects of the churches and to the priests' belongings, of which sum only 2,200 Turkish pounds had been paid for the religious objects. It has been decided to pay the remainder of the above sum.

2. As the inhabitants of Touz had asked for an indemnity of 300,000 piastres for their shops, which had been looted by the Malissors during the disorders and had afterwards accepted 40 per cent. of the said sum, a credit of 1,260 pounds had been allowed for the purpose.

3. As the insurgents at Kastrati had asked for an indemnity of 1,700 pounds for the loss of their cattle and chariots left at their habitations during the disorders, the said sum has been allowed by the Ottoman Government.

4. Some tribesmen who had joined in the insurrection and claimed no indemnity for damage suffered, have asked for relief as paupers. The Government have, in consequence, decided to grant them assistance also, in the form of maize out of the sum of 7,000 pounds allowed for that item.

The total expenses necessitated by the four above-mentioned demands amount to 21,946 Turkish pounds.

As the Ottoman Government have thus received kindly the demands drawn up after the disorders as well as the last four mentioned claims, the inhabitants of these districts having no longer any cause of complaint have since returned to their respective occupations.

Constantinople, June 5.

In the Chamber to-day the Minister of the Interior made his promised statement in reference to the situation in Albania. After alluding to recent events in that province, which he attributed to the work of agitators, and after denying that the Albanians contemplated a rising, the Minister said that the Government would do everything possible to consolidate internal security and to arrest and punish agitators. The Minister concluded with a eulogy of Albanian loyalty to the Throne, and added that the authorities in Albania had been instructed to explain to the population the intentions of the Government, which was anxious for their well-being, and in order to avoid irritating the people would only have recourse to arms should the Albanians be the aggressors. Finally, as a proof that the recent events were only of a local nature, he Adil Bey said that during the past twenty days no further incident had occurred at Djakova, and a delay of forty-eight hours had been granted to the remainder of the Albanians in the hills to return to their homes.

The Chamber declared itself satisfied and applauded the Minister's statement.—Reuter.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, June 3.

Though the Albanians remain massed near Ipek, there has been no further fighting. A Mission of Ulama has been sent to the rebels with an ultimatum to the effect that unless they return to their homes within forty-eight hours the army will proceed on a punitive expedition. In face of this new aggravation of the situation the optimism hitherto manifested in official circles has given way to a feeling of pessimism.

Constantinople, June 5.

Reports are current this evening that an Albanian armed gathering at Yunik, between Djakova and Ipek, having refused to disperse within forty-eight hours, has been attacked and scattered by a force from Djakova commanded by Ismail Fazil Pasha. News from other parts of Kossovo province is satisfactory.

Salonica, June 5.

Brief particulars are now to hand regarding the march to Ipek of Fadil Pasha with eight battalions from Djakova and of Hassan Bey with ten battalions from Mitrovitz. Hassan Bey's force was the first to get into touch with the rebels. A two hours combat resulted in the defeat of the Albanians and the entry of the troops into Ipek. The actual losses appear to be unknown, but apparently they were not heavy on either side. Fadil Pasha succeeded in reaching Ipek without incident and is now encamped two hours from the town.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" BELGRADE CORRESPONDENT.)

In a long article, published to-day (June 1st), the Tiguniski Glasnik, the most highly esteemed Serbian paper, gives renewed warnings, and puts forward fresh suggestions on a subject which seems to haunt and terrorise all Serbians. It is always that nightmare, the foe of Serbia, it is said, that threatens complications in the Balkan peninsula, always the existence of Serbia which is threatened. This is an incubus that no Serbian can shake off.

The present unrest in Albania does not accord with the wishes of the more enlightened Albanians. These local uprisings are not the spontaneous movements of an oppressed people. They are instigated by the local chiefs, who receive support from abroad, which renders suppression all the more difficult.

Before 1910, says the Tiguniski Glasnik, when it was of frequent occurrence that Servians were killed and deprived of their property by Albanian bands, no European paper mentioned the subject. Nor did Europe take any notice when the Turkish Government seized a large quantity of arms that came from Herzegovina, or when an Albanian band obtained ten thousand small arms from an Austrian magazine, which it was supposed they had stolen. Europe ceased to be deaf and blind to these foreign interventions only when Turkish guns began to thunder against the revolutionaries, when the ordinary combats developed into a species of civil war and autonomy was demanded for Albania. Only then is it discovered that the demands of Albanian plunderers are justifiable and that they also have a right to freedom—which, according to Albanian ideas, represent disorder, violence and anarchy.

The present uprising in the districts between Petch and Prizrend, the journal continues, has a grave aspect, because Turkey is now engaged in a war. When it is borne in mind that Austrian and Italian propagandists are actively at work in Albania and Old Serbia, and when one considers that Italy and her allies do all they can to stir up the Albanian element, it is easy to perceive the source of serious complications in the Balkans.

The Reform Commission.

In the course of a recent tour through Macedonia and Albania, Mr. M. H. Donohoe, the Daily Chronicle's enterprising correspondent, came across Hadji Adil Bey's Reform Commission at work at Ohrida. Some particulars of his own adventures and experiences, which he gives in an article published on 28th May show that travel in these parts is not without excitement, but perhaps the most interesting part of his letter is that in which he reports the opinions of Hadji Adil Bey and Mr. Graves, the financial expert and English member of the mission, upon the result of their tour. "Albania," said the Minister, "was reconciled and grateful, for she had been set upon the road that led to peace and progress."

Touching upon Macedonia, he asserted that no Turkish Cabinet would ever be found willing to discuss the question of autonomy. However much agitators might endeavour to incite the people to revolt, he felt that the influence of the bands in the various vilayets was diminishing. Administrative reforms were being carried out, and the Government was acting in a firm but, at the same time, conciliatory spirit. By this means they hoped to alienate the public sympathy that had hitherto been shown towards the revolutionary organisations. When this had been accomplished Bulgarian bands would cease to exist in Macedonia, for when not killed or captured they would die of inanition resulting from public indifference to their propaganda.

Mr. Graves, when asked for his opinion regarding the work of the mission, was even more enthusiastic than the Minister, and unhesitatingly declared that it had accomplished a great deal of good. The results so far had exceeded his most sanguine anticipations. He had nothing but admiration to express for the way the minister had grappled with the various economic and administrative problems encountered on the journey. From avowed enemies he had converted the Malissories into ardent friends. By reason of the present treatment of the Albanians it was clear that the Government had seen the errors of its ways, and was now by wise and generous measures attempting to make reparation for past administrative neglect. The Government had taken a great step forward in the handling of the Albanian question, and he felt convinced that the ultimate results would prove that it was well worth the price the experiment was costing.

With the Turkish Forces in Tripoli.

(FROM A "MORNING POST" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Tripoli (Turkish Headquarters), May 1.

While I was at Homs I heard of the occupation of Bukemesh by the Italians. Accordingly I put off my visit to Mesruti, and after travelling for six days on end arrived on 23rd April in the new camp at Sidi Said, near Bukemesh. I have already telegraphed details of the big fight at Bukemesh, which was very severe. The Italians advanced under the protection of the guns of nine warships—three cruisers, three destroyers, and three torpedo boats—and their newly constructed fortifications. The Turco-Arabs, after a conflict which raged from 6 A.M. to 1 P.M., succeeded in driving the enemy back and getting into their trenches. The Italians retired towards the sea, and took refuge in their old fort, while the guns of the warships prevented the Turks and Arabs from advancing further. The Turks, however, succeeded in taking two small mountain guns to within 900 yards of the Italian forts and effectually silencing the fire of the latter. Their losses were 30 killed and over 100 wounded. The Italians, probably anxious to avenge their defeat, started a vigorous bombardment of Sidi Said in the afternoon. The warships wasted a tremendous amount of shells and shrapnel, which were strewn all over the unoccupied ground outside the Turkish camp, but did no harm whatever.

I gather that the Italians wish the world to believe that they have succeeded in stopping the road to supplies coming from the Tunisian frontier by the route which I took myself when joining the Turkish Army. As a matter of fact the caravans abandoned that road some time ago in order to avoid the fire of the Italian warships, and have since taken one of the five or six which run further south, and which the Italians, if they proceed at the same rate as during the last seven months, will not be able to reach for several years. I may add that provisions enough to keep the population of the country alive for the next year or two are stored in different places and the rainy year has produced, even in this arid country, a fine crop of wheat, the principal foodstuff of the Arab, besides the dates which grow abundantly everywhere. The story that the Turco-Arab Army is starving is absurd. The spirit of the Arabs is excellent, and they are confident that the Italians will find plenty of occupation for the next hundred years should they insist on remaining in the country.

I am the only active correspondent left here except Mr. Seppings Wright. The remainder have gone away, either for reasons of health or from weariness at the protracted campaign. This morning an Italian airship appeared and dropped about a dozen bombs over the camp. It was market day, and there were thousands of Arabs in the market, but not a single bomb fell in the crowd. The Turks fired a few shots from one of the mountain guns, on which the airship left again in the direction of Tripoli.

Interview with Signor Giolitti.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE.")

Rome, May 30.

At his office in the famous Braschi Palazzo, Signor Giolitti was kind enough to receive me yesterday. His greeting was characteristically direct. "I am glad," he said, "to welcome you as the representative of a great English newspaper which has done much for Italy." The premier, who is in his 70th year, although he looks decidedly younger, is a man with a curiously quiet manner, a softly modulated voice seemingly at variance with his sharp searching eyes and a face full of determination. Frugal as he is of speech and sparing of rhetoric, there is a sort of sledge-hammer directness about his statements and phraseology which removed all possibility of misconception and carries conviction. We talked of the war and the prospect of an early peace.

"We are quite willing and ready to treat with Turkey now as we have been from the first," he said; "but whether Turkey sues for peace to-day, to-morrow or a year hence, it will have to be on the basis originally laid down by us—that is a preliminary she recognises our sovereign rights over Tripoli and Cyrenaica. This was our stipulation at the beginning, and we have not receded from the position then taken up, nor will we recede from it."

"Some misconception seems to have arisen as to the action of the Italian Parliament in regard to Tripoli. There has been talk of a decree of annexation. Now there has been no annexation in the sense of making Tripoli and Cyrenaica an integral part of the kingdom of Italy. What we have done is to proclaim our sovereign rights over the territories in question. Much stress has been laid upon this point of annexation by Turkey, but there is a difference—an important difference—and—"

"I should be glad if you would draw special attention to this. The distinction between outright annexation and the proclaiming of sovereign rights over Tripoli is of especial importance to the Moslem inhabitants to whom we have guaranteed inviolable liberty, justice, and certain special rights and privileges. These latter include the free, unhampered exercise of their religion and the continuance of their old established laws and customs. What has really taken place is that the overlordship of the territory in question has been transferred from the Sultan of Turkey to the King of Italy."

"Our country has never countenanced religious persecution, and under the Italian flag full liberty of conscience is assured to the Mussulmans of Tripoli and the rest of the country. No one realises this better than the late victims of Ottoman misrule in Tripoli, who are showing their sentiments very clearly and unmistakably by voluntarily accepting our protection and by subscribing, as they are doing every day, to the funds for the relief of the Italian wounded."

"A Turkish statesman recently made a sneering allusion to the doubtful quality of the civilisation which we had promised to carry into Tripoli. But what have been the blessings which Turkish civilisation has brought there? Has it not meant a country steeped in ignorance, no schools, no roads, no railways and, above all, an unfortunate population growing under the degrading yoke of the slave dealer and the trafficker in human souls? Need I say more?" he asked with a deprecatory wave of his hand. "The inhabitants of Tripoli have only been too glad to relinquish the 'blessings' of Turkish rule and avail themselves of the advantages offered by the Italian occupation."

"Turkey is grossly deceiving herself if she really imagines that the Mussulmans of Tripoli are seriously concerned at the collapse of the Turkish power in the province, or that they are eager to take arms on behalf of the Sultan. It is true that in the hinterland some of the Arab tribes are fighting against us, urged on to resistance by Turkish officers, but these unhappy people do not understand what the struggle is about and that Italy has come in the guise of a friend and liberator seeking to promote their moral and material welfare, and not as an enemy bent upon their extermination."

That the end must come soon was the Premier's closing theme.

Italy in her might had hitherto been merciful, but her patience was nearly exhausted. Shortly she would be compelled to strike hard, and, if that did not bring about Turkey's submission, she would need to strike still harder. Italy could and would go on indefinitely, Signor Giolitti stated, with calm confidence. Her finances were in an excellent condition, and her people unanimous in wishing for the continuance of the war on lines which would bring assured victory to the Italian flag.

"You have seen our people," said Signor Giolitti, "you have had opportunities for observing and talking with them. Am I not right in saying that in the present war Italy speaks but with one voice?" And I felt bound to give an emphatic assent to this asseveration.

"No," he said, in reply to a further question, "the expulsion of our Nationals by the Turkish Government has not embarrassed us in the least. Money has been freely subscribed for their assistance, and the majority of them have already found remunerative employment in Italy."

"And the talk of international peace conference?" I asked. "That," said the Premier, with his quiet smile, "is a matter I prefer not to discuss just now. Shall we not wait a little while and see whether it passes from the region of hypotheses into that of actuality?"

M. H. DONOVAN.

The Expulsion of Italians.

Turkish Official Explanation.

THE following, Reuter's Agency is informed, are the reasons given by the Turkish Government for deciding upon the expulsion of Italian subjects residing in Turkey:

"In consequence of the unexpected difficulties which she encountered from the start of her expedition against Tripoli and Benghazi and of her powerlessness then and now to break down the resistance offered to her on land, Italy believed herself justified in making use of every means to force indirectly the Imperial Ottoman Government and the Ottoman nation to cede to her the provinces which she has not succeeded in occupying with her troops."

"The Ottoman Government has indeed no legal right to object to the advantages which Italy may derive in this struggle from her superiority at sea. The Ottoman Government itself has profited on land as much as possible and with perfect legitimacy from certain advantages which the peculiar nature of the patriotic ardour of its inhabitants have given the defence. But the methods against which the Ottoman Government is not only justified in protesting, but is bound to protest and take counter measures, are those which Italy is using contrary to international law and to the principles laid down at The Hague Conference and in defiance even of humanity and civilisation. It is superfluous to recall here the massacres of thousands of inhabitants of Tripoli, and the wholesale deportation of an entire population, actions against which the whole universe protested."

"The Ottoman Government at that time restrained the shudder of indignation and the call for reprisals which these cruelties aroused throughout the Empire, and abstained from replying, as it would have been fully entitled to do, by the expulsion of all Italians from Turkey."

"This restraint was ill interpreted by Italy and served but to encourage her to act towards Turkey as if all these rules did not exist. After the measures which have been mentioned above she continued intentionally to violate every custom of modern warfare, bombarding unprotected towns, under the pretext of firing at some disarmed gunboats, daily dropping bombs from her balloons and aeroplanes, contrary to the declaration of The Hague, on civilian inhabitants, Turkish troops and ambulances. She stopped a hospital ship to which she had granted a special safe conduct, and this with a view to preventing a few unfortunate sick and wounded men of the Turkish Yemen Army from returning to their native country in search of life and health, she took as prisoners of war all the crew, including the sick-bay attendants, of this hospital ship as well as other non-combatants taken by her warships from neutral ships."

"Finally, when landing recently on Rhodes and the neighbouring islands, the Italians made prisoners of the representatives and agents of the authorities, whose duties have no relation to military operations, and even the Judges of the Courts. Again, with the evident intention of sowing discord and distrust among the elements of the population, they have systematically tried to take also as prisoners of war to Italy inhabitants who have no official capacity; and, what is more serious, they have ostentatiously shown favour to the Christian population by putting all sorts of restrictions on the liberty of the Mussalman population, who have been confined like prisoners in their own quarters."

"The Ottoman Government could bring forward this well-founded indignation of public opinion as justification in itself for the order of expulsion against Italian residents in Turkey. The Government has, however, thought fit to show by the above that it was only forced to adopt this measure, after showing great forbearance, by the conduct of the enemy, and it would point out that the greater part of Italy's actions are formally prohibited by The Hague Conference. The right of wholesale expulsion is, however, one of those measures of war which The Hague Conference did not desire to condemn."

Italian Official Reply.

THE following semi-official communiqué has been issued in Rome in contradiction to the statement recently issued by the Ottoman Government to justify the wholesale expulsion of Italian subjects from the territory of the Turkish Empire.

1. It is untrue that several thousand Arabs of Tripoli have been massacred or deported. In consequence of the events of October last, a certain number of Tripoli Arabs were necessarily expelled. A more considerable number were deported to Italy as an unavoidable measure of public order; many of these have already been able to return to Tripolitania and Cyrenaica.

2. It is untrue that the Italian fleet has bombarded unprotected towns under the pretext of sinking a few disarmed gunboats. In all the bombardments which have taken place only ships, barracks, or military establishments have been hit.

3. It is untrue that bombs have been thrown from aeroplanes on villages, on civilian inhabitants or Ottoman ambulances. The bombing, the use of which is not forbidden by existing Conventions, have never been thrown at groups of combatant enemies.

4. It is untrue that an Ottoman hospital ship has been arbitrarily arrested. The ship Kasserie was, according to the existing Conventions, regularly searched by the Royal warships. As it was ascertained that the ship did not fulfil the conditions required by the same Conventions and was undoubtedly intended for war purposes, the ship was captured and detained at Massowah. The crew, whom it was impossible to consider as sanitary personnel, were made prisoners.

5. It is true that some few officials and citizens of Rhodes, who were all known as active members of the Committee of Union and Progress, have been taken prisoners. But this step was taken as a temporary measure of public order and also as a reprisal, allowed by international law, against the illegal and prolonged detention by Turkey of the members of the Italian Mineralogical Mission—this mission was travelling in the interior of Tripolitania when the war was declared—and of several Italian citizens who had nothing to do with the warlike operations.

6. It is not true that the Italian authorities have imposed restrictions on the liberty of the Moslem population in their own quarters. All the inhabitants of Rhodes, as well as those of the occupied islands, have been treated, irrespective of their religious creed, with equal benevolence and kindness by the Italian authorities. No measure has been taken which could in the least way injure the Moslem population in the exercise of their faith. A great quantity of victuals was delivered to the Cadi to be distributed among the poor Moslem.

In the general principles, although the Italian Government has not yet ratified The Hague Convention, it has taken the greatest care, throughout the whole conduct of the war, to act in full accordance with the rules of that International Act.

With these proceedings it is sufficient to contrast the incredible acts of ferocity committed against the Italian soldiers by the Arabs, under the command of Turkish officers and also the numerous outrages and vexations of all kinds to which the peaceful Italians in Turkey have been subjected up to the very moment of their wholesale expulsion from the Empire.

Suggested Conference.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople. May 29.

For several days past political circles and the Turkish newspapers have been seriously concerned with the question of the possible meeting of a Congress or Conference for the solution of the Italo-Turkish conflict. The newspapers display great hostility to the idea, recalling the fact that from all previous Conferences or Congresses Turkey has come out a loser. Even those journals which do not absolutely reject the plan of a Conference, such as the Jenne Turc and the Itikam, demand not only that the programme shall be strictly confined to the Tripolitan question, but that Turkey shall receive a previous assurance that the discussions shall proceed on the basis of the complete and effective maintenance of Ottoman sovereignty.

The more Radical Tanin will have nothing to do with a Conference. It admits that a termination of hostilities would be very desirable, but it can see no acceptable solution except war or The Hague, admitting the hypothesis of a juridical debate before disinterested legists, but preferring the fortunes of war to the Machiavelism of diplomacy. The Hakk, and even the very moderate Sabah, declare themselves quite as plainly against the idea of a Conference.

This attitude of the newspapers is an exact reflection of the general opinion of the Army and Parliament, and even of the lower classes of the people, who are unwilling to accept at any price the idea of the cession of Tripolitania, and apprehend that the object of the Conference may be a compulsory cession. This current of opinion, the direction and intensity of which are obvious, is not without its influence on diplomatic circles in Constantinople, and on certain members of the Cabinet whose tendencies are specially pacific.

Last autumn I reported to The Daily Telegraph the pressing advice given to the Sublime Porte by the German and Austrian Ambassadors to hasten the solution of the conflict, on the basis of similar clauses to those of the Austro-Turkish protocol relating to Bosnia and Herzegovina, and at the same time I mentioned that certain members of the Cabinet were moved by this advice, which was rendered increasingly attractive by the accessory suggestion of the entry of Turkey into the Triple Alliance, either directly or through Roumanian mediation, which was held glitteringly before their eyes, and which was held represented as the sole and assured means of saving Albania and Macedonia.

Since then there has been a great development of ideas. The conviction of the profoundly national character of the resistance to Italy caused Said Pasha to assume a still more uncompromising attitude, which found expression in the drafting of the Speech from the Throne, and the decision in favour of a general expulsion of Italians. To-day particularly conciliatory statesmen, still under the spell of the accession of Turkey to the Triple Alliance, conceive as the limit of admissible compromises, the cession of Tripoli and Homs to Italy under the reservation of a guarantee of a privileged position for the Mussalman inhabitants, and the Turkish maintenance of Cyrenaica and the whole of the hinterland. But even this combination is declared to be unacceptable by the immense majority of politicians.

As for the diplomatic body, I have been enabled to discover that even the Ambassadors who are particularly well disposed towards Italy, seem now to regard it as undeniable that the Italian decree of annexation was a mistake, and that no combination would appear to be practicable which does not contain some formula for safeguarding the principle of the sovereignty of the Caliph. I have reason to believe that efforts are now being directed towards discovering such a formula which would satisfy Turkey and at the same time humour the amour propre of Italy. The words, an "Italian Egypt," have been pronounced, but this very simple formula was so badly received in Ottoman circles that it appears to have been abandoned and the search for possible combinations continues.

Appeal For Destitute Arabs.

THE Times received from Mr Alan Ostler of Stafford Royde, Halifax, a letter describing the sufferings of the Arabs in Tripoli and endorsing Captain Dixon-Johnson's appeal published in The Times. He writes—

"Unfortunately, the suffering of a few thousand dirty and uncivilized women and children slowly starving to death in the wilderness do not seem to appeal to the popular imagination as forcefully as do those of people of our own kind upon whom disaster has fallen in a more dramatic manner. Nevertheless, I venture to hope that some feeling of sympathy with a people who are gallantly resisting what they hold to be an attempt to rob them of their homes and their country will induce English people to send just a little of the help which they so sorely need."

"It is astonishing how far a very small subscription can be made to go amongst the desert folk, for whom flour and oil make a sumptuous repast. I have seen, in the barrack-square of Azizia, how 100 women and children can be fed upon hardly more than 25 francs' worth of coarse food. And when so little is needed to stand between these poor creatures and death by starvation, one is not afraid to appeal once more to a public which has just given so freely in aid of sufferers whose case, though more dramatic, is assuredly no more dreadful."

Mr G. F. Abbott, who has spent several months in Tripoli as correspondent to various journals, wrote to the Times in connection with the appeals which are being made on behalf of the Tripoli Arabs—

"The condition of those poor people is pitiable beyond description. I have never in any part of the world seen poverty like theirs. Day after day during all the months I spent on the spot women and children might be seen going about the various Turkish camps picking up the grains of barley which the horses had dropped, or even searching in the dung, and when they had collected a handful eating it. When human beings have come to live on the droppings of beasts I think the limit of misery has been reached. The Turks are doing their very best to alleviate this misery. Food is doled out to the sufferers at each camp, but the quantity of these doles is necessarily limited by the necessities of the troops and varies according to the arrival or non-arrival of provision-bringing caravans. In spite of all the assistance rendered locally, there still is ample room for help from outside, and I earnestly hope that such help will not be withheld in a country which is always ready to succour the distressed."

WAR CARTOONS.

The "Times of India" says:—

"Eight Cartoons which originally appeared in the 'Comrade' have lately been reprinted for purposes of framing.....The spirit of Caricature.....does not thrive in India, nor are most of the political Cartoons executed with sufficient skill to make them really telling contribution to any controversy. The 'Comrade's' artist.....knows how to draw.....and has a good deal of the right spirit in him..... Of these eight Cartoons, four deal with the War in Tripoli; one of these.....is a capital piece of work.....As a whole the set is.....very remarkable. The 'Comrade' is to be congratulated on their production."

Complete set of eight for Rs. 3.

Single Cartoon, As. 8.

Apply to the Manager, THE "COMRADE,"
109, Ripon Street, CALCUTTA.

Wanted.

A resident Superintendent for the Bill Islamia Hostel at Calcutta. Salary Rs. 30 to Rs. 40. Must be a qualified person. Knowledge of Arabic, Persian, and English and experience of Hostel work necessary. Age and residence should be mentioned. Applications will be received by the Secretary till 31st July.

6-7-12.

Matrimonial.

England returned Oudh Muhammadan Medical Officer, drawing handsome salary, 35, tall, wants to communicate with a young lady, tall, highly educated, musical, exceedingly handsome between 18 and 25. View Matrimony. Photos exchanged. Strictly confidential.

Address:—

c/o THE MANAGER, "THE COMRADE"

CALCUTTA.

20-7-12.

Wanted

A qualified Lady Doctor for service in a Native State. Apply, giving full particulars as to qualifications, terms and age, to—

A. c/o The "Comrade."

109, Ripon Street, Calcutta

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے مختصر حالات

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ ۲۳ سال سے جاری ہے اور ہندوستان کے مسلمانوں میں کافی نیک نامی اور شہرت حاصل کرچکا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں اسکول لیول تک تعلیم ہوتی ہے اور اسپیشل کلاس بھی موجود ہے۔ علاوہ انگریزی کے مذہبی تعلیم اور بالخصوص ترجمہ قرآن شریف کی تعلیم ہر ایک طالب علم کے لئے لازمی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کا ایلا عظیم الشان اور خوبصورت مکان بنکپا ہے لیکن بوجہ قریبی اسکول کے توسیع عمارت کی ضرورت پڑتی جاتی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے ساتھ ایک بورڈنگ ہوس بھی ہے جہاں ہندوستان کے ہر صوبہ کے دو سو سے زیادہ بورڈر رہتے ہیں جنکی تعلیم و تربیت کا پورا انتظام ہے اور تیسرے سو کے قریب شہر کے طلبہ ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں ایک لہایت اعلیٰ درجہ کا کتب خانہ ہے جس میں دو ہزار سے زیادہ انگریزی کی اور تیس ہائی ہزار سے زیادہ عربی فارسی و اردو کی عمدہ اور اعلیٰ درجہ کی کتابیں موجود ہیں اور طلبہ میں کتب بینی کا مذاق پیدا کیا جاتا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں علاوہ مطبوعہ کتابوں کے ایک ہزار کے قریب عربی فارسی کی لہایت پرانی خوبصورت قلمی کتابیں سلاطین مغلیہ کے فرا میں اور عمدہ اور نادر خوبصورت قلمی تعلیمیں موجود ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں طلبہ کے روزی کپڑوں کا انتظام موجود ہے۔

اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے طلبہ کو انگریزی اور اردو تقرر سکھانے کو تہنیت کلب موجود ہے جہاں ہفتہ وار تقریریں ہوتی ہیں۔ ہندوستان اور ممالک اسلامیہ کے عربی فارسی اردو اور انگریزی اخبارات آتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں صرف لکھوہ ملازمین کا خرچ ایک ہزار روپیہ ماہوار سے زیادہ ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں تیس سو روپیہ ماہوار غریب طلبہ کو بطور امداد کے وظیفہ دیا جاتا ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے تمام مصارف صرف قوم کے متفرق چندہ سے پورے ہوتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ میں توسیع بورڈنگ ہوس کی سخت ضرورت ہے۔ اگر بورڈنگ ہوس میں جگہ ہو تو مسلمان طلبہ کی تعداد ہر جگہ سے زیادہ ہو سکتی ہے۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے بورڈنگ ہوس کا خرچ بہت لہلہ ہے یعنی صرف آٹھ روپیہ ماہوار میں تمام مصارف بورڈنگ ہوجاتے ہیں۔ اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ کے طلبہ کے علاج کے لئے ایک اسپتال سول سرجن اور کمپونڈر کوالرلس ملتا ہے اور مدرسہ طبیہ دہلی کے سہ یا نالہ طبیب مستقل ملازم ہیں۔

۲۲

محمد بشیر الدین منیجر اسلامیہ ہائی اسکول اٹارہ

بابت ماہ جون

موسم بہار کا دورہ تو سال میں ایک
می بار ہوتا ہے۔ لیکن ہمارے
ماہواری جدید ضمیمہ سال بھر میں
بارہ مرتبہ شائع ہو کر اپنا کھسکا لگاتے
ہیں۔ چنانچہ حسب معمول تازہ
بتازہ ضمیمہ بابت ماہ جون سنہ
۱۹۱۲ء بغرض ضمیمہ طبع یافتہ
گراموفون پیش کیا جاتا ہے۔ اور
راضی رہے کہ یہ سال حال کی آخیر
عشماہی کے اعلیٰ ترین رکارڈوں
لجور میں جنہیں ذیل کے مشہور اور
مقبول گانے والوں نے عجیب و غریب
الہاز کیساتھ تیار کیا ہے۔ یعنی دوطرفہ
رکارڈ - ۱۰ - الیچ والہ جن میں چیدہ
چیدہ اور منتخب گانے ہیں - ۶ -
گوئیوں کے گانے ہیں۔ قیمت فی
رکارڈ تین روپیہ۔ ان کے علاوہ اور
گانے بھی اسٹاک میں موجود ہیں۔
(۱) (محمد حسین ماسٹر اف
مارمولیم) کون ہے جو اس سے واقف
نہیں! یہ اچھے طرز کا ایک ہی گانے
والا ہے جیسا کہ لاجواب گانے دہاشمی
مارمولیم بھی بھاتا ہے۔ ان کے
رکارڈوں کی بہت مالک ہے۔
(۲) (سراج الدین) یہ وہی یونیورسٹی
سراج الدین ہیں جن کوئی موسیقی میں
کمال حاصل ہے ان کے گانے کی انسان
داد نہیں دے سکتا۔

(۳) (پیارا صاحب) ان کا گانا تمام
اطراف ملہوستان میں مقبول ہے۔
(۴) (سہراب جی) الیچ والہ
کے سہراب جی ایک نامور گیت ہیں۔
جن سے بچہ بچہ واقف ہے ان کے گانے
میں غصہ کی لہ ڈالی اور بلائی
غیر ہندی ہوتی ہے۔ اور سہراب مزاق
توان پر قول فار کیا ہے۔
(۵) (سہراب جی رہیگو) یہ رکارڈ
اچھوتی الہاز سے سہراب جی و رہیگو
نے بنایا ہے۔ مزاحیہ حاضر جوابی
اور موزوں پہنچان سننے میں آسان ہیں۔
(۶) (تعلیم حسین لکھنوی) یہ گانے
الذہا ہر میں ان سے بہتر کوئی نہیں بھاتا
سکتا اور کمال یہ ہے کہ بچہ و بچہ ایسا معلوم
ہوتا ہے کہ کوئی خوش الحان کوئی گانا ہے۔

المسلمین
دی گریوٹون کیس لکھنؤ
پریس

Matrimonial.

A young Mussalman, Sunni, Shaikh,
B.A., LL.B., of a respectable family of the United Provinces, wishes to marry
a young, handsome and educated girl
of respectable family. Correspondence strictly confidential. Please communicate with

"K" c/o The Manager,
"THE COMRADE,"

29-6-12. 109, Ripon Street, Calcutta

Ladies' Veil

(Burqa).

Latest invention, quite up-to-date.

Best Purdah Keeper.

Most comfortable and easy wear

SEVERAL AWARDS.

APPROVED BY

H. H. The Begum Sahiba of Bhopal.

Can be had for Rs. 10

FROM THE

Khatoon Stores, Delhi.

ہندوستانیوں سے زیادہ یورپین
افروا صنعت و حرفت کی قدر کر رہی
ہیں خاتون استور دہلی کی دستکاروں
و لہجہ آرائی سامان سے الگ کمرہ
سجائے جاتے ہیں۔ جنہر اسکو متعدد
انعام طلائی و نقرئی تمغہ مل چکے
ہیں۔

زبانہ اعتماد میں۔
خواتین و الگ بچوں کے خوشنما و
آرام دہ لباس دیکر ضروریات حالہ۔
داری تیار ہو کر مناسب قیمت
پر فروخت کی جاتی ہیں۔

29-6-12.

Calcutta General Printing Company

THE EDINBURGH PRESS

PRINTING FOR ADVERTISERS

MODERN
TYPOGRAPHICAL
DESIGN

300, BOWBAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

WANTED A Mohamadan Graduate

To teach a boy aged 16 years preparing for the Entrance Examination of the Allahabad
University. The post is temporary. Pay
Rs. 30 with free quarters. For particulars apply to:-

SVED KHURSHIED.

Assistant Engineer, Ambala-Taranga

Light Railway,

Timba Office

Post Sattana,

13-7-12. (Mahikanta Agency) via Meharana.

Wanted.

Graduates (A & B Courses)
B.S.C.'s for Employment in School in U P, C P., Punjab and Bengal Apply with copies of certificates to the Service
Securing Agency, Delhi

6-7-12.

In Aid of The Moslem University Fund.

Dr. Iqbal's National Song.

Sung By

A Muhammadan Gentleman
of Aligarh.

10-Inch Double-sided Record.

Nos. { 9-12524.

{ 9-12525.

Price, Rs. 3.

To be had from Agents of
The Gramophone Company,
Limited, throughout India.

The Review of Religions.

A monthly magazine dealing with important religious questions, offering a fair and impartial review of the prominent religions of the world
and removing all misconceptions against Islam.

Alex. R. Webb, New Jersey, U.S.A. —
"Its articles are well written, thoughtful and clear expositions of spiritual truth"

"It is doing a glorious work."

Professor Houtama, Editor-in-Chief of the Encyclopedia of Islam: "Extremely interesting."

Count Tolstoi: "The ideas are very profound and very true."

Review of Reviews:—"Western readers interested in the subject of the vitality of Muhammadanism should subscribe to the
'Review of Religions.'"

Annual subscription, Rs. 4 for India, and
Rs. 4-8 or 6s. for foreign countries.

All communications should be addressed to

THE MANAGER,

REVIEW OF RELIGIONS,

Qadian, Punjab.

5-10-12.

DO YOU WANT TO EARN RS. 3 A DAY — ?

Making Hosiery on Durbar Auto-knitters, work easy and interesting and finished in spare time. No Experience necessary. Distance immaterial. Reliable persons kept well employed with regular work by Hosiery Manufacturers.

WE SHOW YOU HOW

to work the machine—to make the Hosiery. You then supply us with your work done at Home, for which we pay you specified wages.

CAN YOU FIND A BETTER PROPOSITION ?

What Others Say.

JUBBULPORE, C. P.,

April 24th, 1912.

"I am more than pleased with your Auto-knitter, which you sent me a month back. I have learnt to knit from your Instruction Book, which is simple and clear. I can now make six pairs of Ladies' Ribbed Hose a day. I can confidently recommend your knitter to anyone wishing for an increase of income in leisure hours. Wishing you every success."

(Sd.) Mrs. P. B.

Write for Prospectus To-day.

GENZ, WHEELER & CO.,

Dept. 36, 28, Dalhousie Square, W., Calcutta.

